"(d) Loans for the construction or purchase of physical facilities, together with interest on the loans, shall be repaid upon an amortization plan over a period not in excess of 20 years.

"MISCELLANEOUS LOAN PROVISIONS

"SEC. 8. (a) Loans to any cooperative association or stabilization corporation and advances for insurance purposes shall bear interest at a rate of interest per annum equal to the lowest rate of yield (to the nearest one-eighth of 1 per cent) of any Government obligation bearing a date of issue subsequent to April 6, 1917 (except postal-savings bonds), and outstanding at the time the loan agreement is entered into or the advance is made by the board, as certified by the Secretary of the Treasury to the board upon its request: Provided, That in no case shall the rate exceed 4 per cent per annum on the unpaid principal.

"(b) Payments of principal or interest upon any such loan or advance shall be covered into the revolving fund.

"(c) Loans to any cooperative association or stabilization corporation shall be made upon the terms specified in this act and upon such other terms not inconsistent therewith and upon such security as the board deems necessary.

"(d) No loan or insurance agreement shall be made by the board if in its judgment the agreement is likely to increase unduly the production of any agricultural commodity of which there is commonly produced a surplus in excess of the annual marketing requirements.

"STABILIZATION CORPORATIONS

"SEC. 9. (a) The board may, upon application of the advisory commodity committee for any commodity, recognize as a stabilization corporation for the commodity any corporation if—

"(1) the board finds that the marketing situation with respect to the agricultural commodity requires or may require the establishment of a stabilization corporation in order effectively to carry out the policy declared in section 1; and

"(2) the board finds that the corporation is duly organized under the laws of a State or Territory; and

"(3) the board finds that all the outstanding voting stock or membership interests in the corporation are and may be owned only by cooperative associations handling the commodity; and

"(4) the corporation agrees with the board to adopt such by-laws as the board may from time to time require, which by-laws, among other matters, shall permit cooperative associations not stockholders or members of the corporation to become stockholders or members therein upon equitable terms.

"(b) Any stabilization corporation for an agricultural commodity (1) may act as a marketing agency for its stockholders or members in preparing, handling, storing, processing, and merchandising for their account any quantity of the agricultural commodity or its food products, and (2) for the purpose of controlling any surplus in the commodity in furtherance of the policy declared in section 1, may prepare, purchase, handle, store, process, and merchandise, otherwise than for the account of its stockholders or members, any quantity of the agricultural commodity or its food products, whether or not such commodity or products are acquired from its stockholders or members.

"(c) Upon request of the advisory committee for any commodity the board is authorized to make loans from the revolving fund to the stabilization corporation for the commodity for working capital to enable the corporation to act as a marketing agency for its stockholders or members as hereinbefore provided. Not less than 75 per cent of all profits derived by a stabilization corporation each year from its operations as such a marketing agency shall be paid into a merchandising reserve fund to be established by the corporation. No such payment shall be required whenever the fund is in such amount as, in the judgment of the board, constitutes a sufficient reserve for such operations of the corporation. Out of the remainder of such profits for the year the corporation shall repay any outstanding loan made under this subdivision and the accrued interest thereon, or if all such loans and accrued interest have been fully repaid, then it may distribute a patronage dividend to its stockholders or members. Such patronage dividend shall be paid to each stockholder or member on the basis of the total volume of the commodity or its products for the year marketed for his account through the corporation.

"(d) Upon request of the advisory committee for any commodity the board is authorized to make loans from the revolving fund to the stabilization corporation for the commodity to enable the corporation to control any surplus in the commodity as hereinbefore provided and for meeting carrying and handling charges and other operating expenses in connection therewith. The board shall require a stabilization corporation to establish and maintain adequate reserves from its profits from its surplus control operations before it shall pay any dividends out of such profits. All losses of the corporation from such operations shall be paid from such reserves, or if such reserves are inadequate, then such losses shall be paid by the board as a loan from the revolving fund. Any amounts so loaned for payment of losses shall be repaid into the revolving fund by the corporation from future profits from its surplus control operations. Any stabilization corporation receiving loans under this subdivision for surplus control operations shall exert every reasonable effort to avoid losses and to secure profits, but shall not withhold any commodity from the domestic market if the prices have become unduly enhanced, resulting in distress to domestic consumers. Stockholders or members of the corporation shall not be subject to assessment for any losses incurred in surplus control operations of the corporation.

"(e) A stabilization corporation shall keep such accounts, records, and memoranda, and make such reports with respect to its transactions, business methods, and financial condition, as the board may from time to time prescribe; shall permit the board to audit its accounts annually and at such other times as the board deems advisable; and shall permit the board, upon its own initiative or upon written request of any stockholder or member, to investigate the financial condition and business methods of the corporation.

"(f) No loan shall be made to any stabilization corporation unless, in the judgment of the board, the loan is in furtherance of the policy declared in section 1.

"CLEARING HOUSE ASSOCIATIONS

"SEC. 10. Upon application of any cooperative association handling an agricultural commodity or of producers of an agricultural commodity, the board is authorized, if it deems such association or producers representative of the commodity, to assist in forming producer-controlled clearing house associations adapted to effecting the economic distribution of the agricultural commodity among the various markets and to minimizing waste and loss in the marketing of the commodity, if such assistance, in the judgment of the board, will be in furtherance of the policy declared in section 1. The board may provide for the registration, and for the termination of the registration, of any clearing house association in accordance with such regulations as the board may prescribe. Such clearing house associations are authorized to operate under rules adopted by the member cooperative associations and approved by the board. Independent dealers in, and handlers, distributors, and processors of, the commodity, as well as cooperative associations handling the commodity, shall be eligible for membership in the clearing house association: Provided, That the policy of such clearing house association shall be approved by a committee of producers which, in the opinion of the board, is representative of the commodity. Clearing house associations shall utilize the Market News Service and other facilities of the Department of Agriculture as far as possible.

"PRICE INSURANCE

"SEC. 11. The board is authorized, upon application of cooperative associations, to enter into agreements, subject to the conditions hereinafter specified, for the insurance of the cooperative associations against loss through price decline in the agricultural commodity handled by the associations and produced by the members thereof. Such agreements shall be entered into only if, in the judgment of the board, (1) coverage is not available from private agencies at reasonable rates, (2) the insurance will be in furtherance of the policy declared in section 1, (3) the agricultural commodity is regularly bought and sold in the markets in sufficient volume to establish a recognized basic price for the market grades of the commodity, and (4) there is available with respect to the commodity such market information as will afford an accurate record of prevailing prices for the commodity covering a period of years of sufficient length to serve as a basis to calculate the risk and fix the premium for the insurance. The agreements shall require payment of premiums so fixed and shall include such other terms as, in the judgment of the board, are necessary. The board may make advances from the revolving fund to meet obligations under any insurance agreement, but such advances together with the interest thereon shall, as soon as practicable, be repaid from the proceeds of insurance premiums.

"ADMINISTRATIVE APPROPRIATION

"SEC. 12. For expenditures in executing the functions vested in the board by this act (including salaries and expenses of members, officers, and employees of the board and per diem compensation and expenses of the commodity committees), incurred prior to July 1, 1930, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $1,500,000. No part of the moneys appropriated in pursuance of this authorization shall be available for expenditures, including loans and advances, for the payment of which the revolving fund or insurance moneys are authorized to be used.

"AVOIDANCE OF DUPLICATION

"SEC. 13 (a) The board shall, in cooperation with any governmental establishment in the Executive branch of the Government, including any field service thereof at home or abroad, avail itself of the services and facilities thereof in order to avoid preventable expense or duplication of effort.

"(b) The President may by Executive order direct any such governmental establishment to furnish the board such information and data as such governmental establishment may have pertaining to the functions of the board; except that the President shall not direct that the board be furnished with any information or data supplied by any person in confidence to any governmental establishment in pursuance of any provision of law or of any agreement with a governmental establishment.

"(c) The board may cooperate with any State or Territory, or department, agency, or political subdivision thereof, or with any person.

"(d) The board shall, through the Secretary of Agriculture, indicate to the appropriate bureau or division of the Department of Agriculture any special problem on which a research is needed to aid in carrying out the provisions of this act.

"(e) The President is authorized, by Executive order, to transfer to or retransfer from the jurisdiction and control of the board the whole or any part of (1) any office, bureau, service, division, commission, or board in the executive branch of the Government engaged in scientific or extension work, or the furnishing of services, with respect to the marketing of agricultural commodities, (2) its functions pertaining to such work or services, and (3) the records, property, including office equipment, personnel, and unexpended balances of appropriation, pertaining to such work or services.

"EXAMINATION OF BOOKS AND ACCOUNTS OF BOARD

"SEC. 14. Vouchers approved by the chairman of the board for expenditures from the revolving fund pursuant to any loan or advance or from insurance moneys pursuant to any insurance agreement, shall be final and conclusive upon all officers of the Government; except that all financial transactions of the board shall, subject to the above limitations, be examined by the General Accounting Office at such times and in such manner as the Comptroller General of the United States may by regulation prescribe. Such examination, with respect to expenditures from the revolving fund pursuant to any loan or advance or from insurance moneys pursuant to any insurance agreement, shall be for the sole purpose of making a report to the Congress and to the board of expenditures and of loan and insurance agreements in violation of law, together with such recommendations thereon as the Comptroller General deems advisable.

"MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

"SEC. 15 (a) As used in this act, the term 'cooperative association' means any association qualified under the act entitled 'An act to authorize the association of producers of agricultural products,' approved February 18, 1922. Whenever in the judgment of the board the producers of any agricultural commodity are not organized into cooperative associations so extensively as to render such cooperative associations representative of the commodity, then the privileges, assistance, and authority available under this act to cooperative associations, shall also be available to other associations and corporations producer-owned and producer-controlled and organized for and actually engaged in the marketing of the agricultural commodity. No such association or corporation shall be held to be producer-owned and producer-controlled unless owned and controlled by cooperative associations as above defined and/or by individuals engaged as original producers of the agricultural commodity.

"(b) It shall be unlawful for any member, officer, or employee of the board to speculate, directly or indirectly, in any agricultural commodity or product thereof, or in contracts relating thereto, or in the stock or membership interests of any association or corporation engaged in handling, processing, or disposing of any such commodity or product. Any person violating this subdivision shall upon conviction thereof be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned not more than 10 years, or both.

"(c) It shall be unlawful (1) for any cooperative association, stabilization corporation, clearing-house association, or commodity committee, or (2) for any director, officer, employee, or member or person acting on behalf of any such association, corporation, or committee, to which or to whom information has been imparted in confidence by the board, to disclose such information in violation of any regulation of the board. Any such association, corporation, or committee, or director, officer, employee, or member thereof, violating this subdivision, shall be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

"(d) The inclusion in any governmental report, bulletin, or other such publication hereafter issued or published of any prediction with respect to cotton prices is hereby prohibited. Any officer or employee of the United States who authorizes or is responsible for the inclusion in any such report, bulletin, or other publication of any such prediction, or who knowingly causes the issuance or publication of any such report, bulletin, or other publication containing any such prediction, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not less than $500 or more than $5,000, or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both: Provided, That this subdivision shall not apply to the members of the board when engaged in the performance of their duties herein provided.

"(e) If any provision of this act is declared unconstitutional, or the applicability thereof to any person, circumstance, commodity, or class of transactions with respect to any commodity is held invalid, the validity of the remainder of the act and the applicability of such provision to other persons, circumstances, commodities, and classes of transactions shall not be affected thereby.

"(f) This act may be cited as the 'agricultural marketing act.'"

And the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 1) to establish a Federal farm board to promote the effective merchandising of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce, and to place agriculture on a basis of economic equality with other industries, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The Senate amendment struck out all of the House bill after the enacting clause. The House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, with an amendment which is a substitute for both the House bill and the Senate amendment. The essential differences between the House bill and the Senate amendment, and the nature of the corresponding provisions of the substitute agreed upon by the conferees, are set forth in the following discussion:

DECLARATION OF POLICY

The House bill (sec. 1) declared it to be the policy of Congress to promote the effective merchandising of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce so that the industry of agriculture would be placed on a basis of economic equality with other industries. This end was to be obtained by (1) minimizing speculation, (2) preventing inefficient and wasteful methods of distribution, (3) limiting undue and excessive price fluctuations, (4) encouraging the organization of producers into cooperative associations and promoting the establishment and financing of a farm-marketing system of producer-owned and producer-controlled cooperative associations and other agencies, and (5) aiding in preventing and controlling surpluses in any agricultural commodity, through orderly production and distribution, so as to maintain advantageous domestic markets and prevent such surpluses from unduly depressing the prices for the commodity.

The Senate amendment (sec. 1) declared it to be the policy of the United States to minimize price fluctuations by controlling surpluses, and by encouraging producers to organize effective associations or corporations under their own control for greater unity of effort in marketing. The Senate amendment described a surplus as a "seasonal or year's total surplus, produced in the United States and either local or national in extent; that is, in excess of the requirements for the orderly marketing of any agricultural commodity or in excess of the domestic requirements for such commodity." The substitute (sec. 1) retains substantially the provisions of the House bill, together with the provisions in the Senate amendment defining a surplus. The Senate amendment (sec. 1 (2)) contained a provision declaring that the objects hereinbefore referred to should be accomplished in such manner as to bring about a substantial and permanent improvement in agriculture and promote the best interests of the country as a whole. It also declared (sec. 14 (f)) it to be the purpose of this act to organize, encourage, and utilize existing cooperative farm organizations and farm cooperative marketing agencies. Both of these provisions have been omitted from the substitute.

FEDERAL FARM BOARD

The House bill (sec. 2 (a)) provides for a Federal farm board, to consist of a chairman and five other appointed members, the chairman to serve at the pleasure of the President and his salary to be fixed by the President. The House bill also provided that the President should designate any appointed member to act as chairman in case of the absence or disability of the chairman. These provisions are omitted from the substitute.

The Senate amendment (sec. 2) provided for a Federal farm board, to consist of 12 appointed members, 1 from each of the 12 Federal land-bank districts, the chairman to be designated by the President and to be the principal executive officer of the board and the board to select a vice chairman. It also provided that the terms of office and the salary of all appointed members, including the chairman, should be the same, namely, $12,000 a year. The Senate amendment further provided that no appointed member should during his term of office engage in the business of buying and selling or otherwise be financially interested in any agricultural commodity or product thereof, except such business as was necessary in the operation of his own farm or farms.

The substitute (sec. 2) provides for a Federal farm board to consist of eight appointed members and retains the provisions of the Senate amendment providing that the salaries and terms of office of all the appointed members, including the chairman, shall be the same, namely, $12,000 a year. It also contains a provision requiring the President to give due consideration to having the major agricultural commodities produced in the United States fairly represented upon the board rather than to select them from the several land-bank districts. The provisions of the Senate amendment requiring the President to designate the chairman of the board and authorizing the board to select a vice chairman are adopted in the substitute as well as the provision providing that no appointed member should, during his term of office, engage in the business of buying and selling or otherwise be financially interested in any agricultural commodity or product thereof.

The Senate amendment (sec. 2) contained a clause providing, as a qualification to membership on the board, that each appointed member shall have demonstrated his capacity and fitness by a record of success in agricultural activities. This provision is omitted from the substitute.

ADVISORY COMMODITY COMMITTEES

The House bill (sec. 3 (b)) provided that the board should invite the cooperative associations for any commodity to establish advisory commodity committees to consist of seven members, at least two of whom were to be experienced handlers and processors of the commodity. Members were to be selected by cooperative associations in such manner as the board might prescribe. The Senate amendment (sec. 4 (a)) provided for the establishment of an advisory council for each commodity prior to the first certification of a stabilization corporation for that commodity. Each council was to consist of seven members selected by the board from persons nominated by the cooperative associations for the commodity in such manner as the board should prescribe.

The substitute retains the House provisions with the addition of certain provisions from the Senate amendment (sec. 4) not found in the House bill and covering such details as meetings of the advisory committee, the selection of its chairman and secretary, and an outline of the functions and authority of the committee. Among these latter are conferences with the board, calling for information from it, making oral or written representations to it, and cooperation with it in advising producers of the commodity in the development of suitable programs of planting and breeding.

While the House bill (sec. 3 (a)) and the Senate amendment (sec. 5 (a)) both give the board power to provide for combined treatment of one or more agricultural commodities as one commodity or separate treatment for different classifications or types of a single commodity, neither the House bill nor the Senate amendment defines the term "agricultural commodity." However, the Senate amendment (sec. 1 (3)) provided that the term shall include, among other matters, cornstalks, wheat, oat and rice stalks, cotton stalks, and other like agricultural products. This provision is omitted from the substitute.

GENERAL POWERS OF THE BOARD

The substitute (sec. 4) makes no change from the House bill (sec. 2 (b)) in the general powers of the board except that it omits from the House bill the requirements that the principal office of the board shall be located in the Department of Agriculture and retains the provisions in the Senate amendment (sec. 3 (a) and (f)) to the effect that the board shall have its principal office in the District of Columbia, meet at the call of the chairman, the Secretary of Agriculture, or a majority of its members.

The Senate amendment (sec. 3 (e)) provided that the appointment of experts should be subject to the civil service laws and their salaries should be fixed in accordance with the classification act of 1923. The House bill did not contain these restrictions, and they have been omitted from the substitute.

SPECIAL POWERS

The substitute (sec. 5) contains the identical provisions of the House bill (sec. 4) with the exception of omitting therefrom the requirement that the board shall have authority to make investigations and reports upon the economic need for reclamation and irrigation projects.

REVOLVING FUND

The provisions of the House bill (sec. 5 (a)) and of the Senate amendment (sec. 8) establishing a revolving fund of $500,000,000 were identical. The substitute (sec. 6) of course makes no change.

LOANS TO COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATIONS

The House bill provided for loans (sec. 5 (b)) to cooperative associations for effective merchandising, for the construction or acquisition by purchase or lease of storage or other physical marketing facilities, for the formation of clearing-house associations, and for the extension of membership of cooperative associations through education in the advantages of cooperative marketing. The Senate amendment (sec. 6 (c)) provided for loans to cooperative associations for the acquisition by purchase, construction, or otherwise of facilities and equipment for preparing, handling, storing, processing, or sale or other disposition of agricultural commodities, for working capital for cooperative associations, and for the purchasing of supplies and equipment by cooperative associations for use in the production of agricultural commodities by their members. The substitute (sec. 7 (a)) retains the provisions of the House bill, except that the provision for the loans for physical facilities is broadened so that physical facilities may be acquired for any phase of marketing, such as preparing, handling, storing, processing, or merchandising agricultural commodities or their food products.

The House bill (sec. 5 (b)) contained certain provisions not found in the Senate amendment restricting the loans for physical facilities to 80 per cent of their value and further restricting them so as to avoid unnecessary duplication of existing facilities if the services of existing facilities were available at reasonable rates or the facilities could be purchased or leased for a reasonable price or rent. The substitute (sec. 7 (c)) retains these House provisions.

In addition to the loans above set forth the Senate amendment (sec. 6 (c)) provided for loans to agricultural purchasing associations (as well as to cooperative marketing associations) for the purchase of supplies and equipment for use in production. The House bill contained no similar provision, and the substitute likewise omits the provision.

The Senate amendment (sec. 6 (d)) also provided for loans to cooperative associations for the purpose of enabling them to advance to their members a greater share of the market price of the commodity delivered to them than is practicable under other credit facilities. These loans were to be secured by a lien upon the commodity and, together with advances made by intermediate credit banks and other agencies upon the commodity, were not to exceed 85 per cent of its market value. The House bill had no such provision. The substitute (sec. 7 (a)(5)) retains the Senate provision, but with modifications eliminating the per cent limitation and leaving the matter of security to the discretion of the board.

MISCELLANEOUS LOAN PROVISIONS

The House bill (sec. 5 (a)) provided that all loans to cooperative associations or stabilization corporations or advances for insurance purposes should be at a rate of interest fixed by the board. The Senate amendment (sec. 6 (f)) provided that such loans and advances should bear interest at a rate of interest per annum equal to the lowest rate of yield of any Government obligation bearing a date of issue since April 6, 1917 (except postal-savings bonds), and outstanding at the time of the loan or advance, provided that in no case should this rate exceed 4 per cent per annum on the unpaid principal. The substitute (sec. 8 (a)) retains the Senate provision with an amendment to clear up a minor administrative difficulty. The House bill (sec. 5 (a)) provided that payments of interest should be covered into the Treasury, while the Senate amendment (sec. 6 (f)) provided that such payments should be covered into the revolving fund. The substitute (sec. 8 (b)) retains the Senate provision.

The Senate amendment (sec. 6) in many cases specified the nature of security upon which the various loans were to be made. The House bill (sec. 5 (b)) and the committee substitute (sec. 8 (c)) leave this matter to the discretion of the board.

The House bill (sec. 5 (e)) required that no loan or insurance agreement should be made by the board if, in its judgment, the agreement is likely to increase unduly production of a commodity of which there is commonly produced a surplus in excess of the annual domestic requirements. The Senate amendment had no such provision. The committee substitute (sec. 8 (d)) retains the House provision with a modification which limits the restriction to commodities of which there is commonly produced a surplus in excess of the annual requirements for orderly distribution among both domestic and foreign markets.

The Senate amendment provided for the allocation of the revolving fund among the various classes of loans for cooperative associations and stabilization corporations by specifying maximum amounts which the amount of the outstanding loans for the particular purpose could not exceed. The House bill contained no such restrictions, and the substitute likewise omits such restrictions.

STABILIZATION CORPORATIONS

Dual functions: Both the House bill and the Senate amendment recognized two main functions of stabilization corporations. First, the stabilization corporation for any commodity was to engage in surplus control operations for the purpose of stabilizing the market for the commodity. This was to be done through purchasing, storing, and merchandising the commodity. In the second place, the stabilization corporations were to act as marketing agents. They were to be central marketing agencies through which their stockholders or members, namely, the cooperative associations, might on their own account dispose of the commodity produced or lawfully acquired by them, retaining the profits and suffering the losses. (See sec. 6 (b) of the House bill and sec. 5 (d) of the Senate amendment.)

Loans: The House bill (sec. 6 (b)) provided that loans from the revolving fund might be made to a stabilization corporation for working capital for its surplus-control operations. The Senate amendment not only provided for similar loans to a stabilization corporation (sec. 6 (b)) but also authorized the board to subscribe to stock of a stabilization corporation from the revolving fund in order that the corporation might have available working capital for its merchandising operations on account of its members (sec. 5 (f)). The substitute provides for obtaining working capital for both surplus-control operations and merchandising operations by means of loans (sec. 9 (c) and (d)), which will supplement the funds accumulated in its reserves or obtainable from existing banking facilities.

Reserves: The House bill (sec. 6 (d)) required a stabilization corporation to establish and maintain reserves before it could pay dividends out of its profits from any source. Losses which exceed its capital and reserves for all purposes were to be met out of future profits from any source and were not permitted to be assessed against stockholders or members. The Senate amendment segregated the two operations of the corporation, namely, surplus control operations and merchandising operations on account of its members. To this end the Senate amendment provided that 75 per cent of all profits made from surplus control operations should be paid into a surplus control reserve fund so long as that fund was inadequate in the judgment of the board. The remainder of the profits from the surplus control operations could be distributed as a patronage dividend. All losses from surplus control operations were payable from the surplus control reserve fund, or, if that fund was inadequate, then from the revolving fund, subject to repayment with interest from future profits from surplus control operations. The profits of a stabilization corporation from its merchandising operations for the account of its members were in nowise subject to liability for losses from the surplus control operations. On the other hand, the Senate amendment provided that 75 per cent of its profits from merchandising operations for the account of its members should be paid into a merchandising reserve fund so long as that fund was inadequate in the judgment of the board. Out of the remainder of such profits there was required to be paid a cash dividend on the outstanding stock which had been issued in order to obtain working capital, and any balance might be distributed as a patronage dividend.

The substitute (sec. 9 (c) and (d)) retains the segregation principle provided in the Senate amendment. A merchandising reserve fund is established into which go 75 per centum of the profits derived by the stabilization corporation from its operations as a marketing agency for its members so long as that fund is inadequate in the judgment of the board. The remainder of its profits from its merchandising operations are to be used for repayment of the loan (which loan, as above noted, takes the place of the stock issue provided in the Senate amendment) for working capital for its merchandising operations and interest thereon, and thereafter for patronage dividends. As to profits from surplus control operations, these are required to be paid into such reserves as the board may require the stabilization corporation to establish and maintain. Any excess may be paid out in dividends of such character as the corporation may lawfully declare and may in its discretion so declare.

Establishment: The House bill (sec. 6 (a)) provided for the establishment of stabilization corporations only upon application of the advisory commodity committee for the commodity. The Senate bill (sec. 5 (a)) permitted any qualified corporation to make application for certification as a stabilization corporation for a commodity. The substitute retains the requirement of the House bill.

Accounts: The substitute (sec. 9 (e)) retains the provisions found in the Senate amendment (sec. 5 (c)), but not in the House bill, to the effect that the board may prescribe accounts, records, and memoranda of a stabilization corporation, may require it to make reports with respect to its transactions, business methods, and financial condition, may audit its accounts annually and at such other times as the board deems advisable, and may, upon its own initiative or upon written request of a stockholder or member of the stabilization corporation, investigate the financial condition and business methods of the corporation.

The substitute (sec. 9 (d)) also retains the provision found in the House bill (sec. 6 (c)), but not the Senate amendment, to the effect that a stabilization corporation shall exert every reasonable effort to avoid losses and to secure profits, but shall not withhold any commodity from the domestic market if the prices thereof have become unduly enhanced resulting in distress to domestic consumers.

By-laws: The House bill (sec. 6 (a) (4)) required the stabilization corporation, before being recognized as such by the board, to agree with the board to adopt such by-laws as the board may from time to time require and, among other matters, by-laws which permitted cooperative associations not stockholders or members of the corporation to become stockholders of members therein upon equitable terms. The Senate amendment (sec. 5 (a) (3)) required a stabilization corporation to agree with the board, before being certified as a stabilization corporation, to adopt by-laws, and make such changes therein as in the judgment of the board were necessary to enable the corporation effectively to conform to the requirements of the act. The Senate amendment (sec. 5 (a)) further provided that the board shall prescribe the terms upon which a cooperative association should be entitled to admission to membership in a stabilization corporation. The Senate amendment further provided (sec. 5 (b)) that upon becoming a member of the stabilization corporation, a cooperative association should subscribe for shares of stock in the corporation in number equal to the number of members of the cooperative association. The substitute (sec. 9 (a)) retains the provisions of the House bill upon the above matters.

Duration: The charter of a corporation must be satisfactory to the board before the corporation will be recognized by the board as a stabilization corporation. Further, the board controls the by-laws of the corporation. It therefore follows that the surplus-control operations and the merchandising operations of a stabilization corporation are subject to control by the board in the interest of effectuating the declared policy. The Senate amendment (sec. 5 (a)) provided that the authority of a corporation to act as a stabilization corporation would expire at the end of five years unless renewed. The House bill and the substitute omit this provision as unnecessary in view of the control which the board has over the stabilization corporation, as above set forth, and in view of the power of the board to supervise the reserves of a stabilization corporation.

Federal instrumentalities: The Senate amendment (sec. 5 (a)) also declared stabilization corporations to be Federal instrumentalities. The House bill had no similar declaration and it is omitted in the substitute.

CLEARING-HOUSE ASSOCIATIONS

The substitute (sec. 10) retains the provisions of the House bill (sec. 5 (c)) with the exception of a clerical change and the addition of the provisions of the Senate amendment (sec. 9) which required clearing-house associations to utilize the market news service and other facilities of the Department of Agriculture, as far as possible, and which gave the board power to terminate the registration of any clearing-house association.

Under the provisions of the Senate amendment only cooperative associations handling perishable commodities could form a clearing-house association. The House bill and the substitute make possible clearing-house associations for all commodities.

PRICE INSURANCE

The House bill (sec. 5 (d)) authorized the board to enter into insurance agreements with cooperative associations only upon application of the advisory commodity committee for the commodity. It also provided that such agreements should be entered into only if, in the judgment of the board, the agricultural commodity was regularly traded in upon an exchange in sufficient volume to establish a recognized basic price for the commodity and such exchange had accurate price records of sufficient value to serve as a basis to calculate the risk and fix the premiums for the insurance.

The Senate amendment (sec. 7) contained no provision requiring the advisory commodity committee to make application for the insurance on behalf of the cooperative associations for the commodity. The Senate amendment also provided that such insurance agreements should be entered into if in the judgment of the board the agricultural commodity was regularly bought and sold in the markets in sufficient volume to establish a recognized basic price for the commodity and there was available with respect to the commodity such market information as would afford an accurate record of prevailing prices for the commodity of sufficient value to serve as a basis to calculate the risk and fix the premiums for the insurance.

The substitute (sec. 11) adopts the provisions of the Senate amendment.

The House bill (sec. 5 (a)) provided that the interest rate on insurance moneys temporarily advanced from the revolving fund should be fixed by the board. The substitute omits this provision and fixes the rate of interest the same as for loans. (See sec. 8 (a) of substitute.)

ADMINISTRATIVE APPROPRIATION

The House bill (sec. 8 (a)) authorized an appropriation of $1,500,000 for the administrative expenses of the board incurred prior to July 1, 1930, whereas the Senate amendment (sec. 11) authorized an appropriation of $500,000 for the administrative expenses of the board incurred prior to July 1, 1930. The substitute (sec. 12) retains the provision of the House bill.

AVOIDANCE OF DUPLICATION

Cooperation with governmental establishments: The House bill (sec. 7) and the Senate amendment (sec. 13) were substantially the same in providing for the cooperation with governmental establishments in the executive branch of the Government; authorizing the President to direct any governmental establishment to furnish the board with information and data pertaining to the functions of the board; and authorizing the board to cooperate with any State or Territory, or department, agency, or political subdivision thereof, or with any person. However, the House bill, in authorizing cooperation with any governmental establishment in the executive branch of the Government, included in addition any field service thereof, at home or abroad. The substitute (sec. 13 (a), (b), and (c)) adopts the language of the Senate amendment but includes the provision of the House bill relating to cooperation with the field service of any governmental establishment at home or abroad.

The Senate amendment (sec. 3 (g)) directed the board through the Secretary of Agriculture to indicate to the appropriate bureau or division of the Department of Agriculture any special problem on which a research is needed by the board to aid it in carrying out the provisions of the act. No such provision was contained in the House bill. The substitute (sec. 13 (d)) adopts the Senate amendment.

Transfer of bureaus, etc.: The House bill (sec. 9) authorized the President to transfer to or retransfer from the jurisdiction and control of the board the whole or any part of any office, bureau, service, division, commission, or board in the executive branch of the Government engaged in scientific or extension work, or the furnishing of service with respect to the marketing of agricultural commodities, together with the records, property, personnel, and appropriations pertaining thereto. No such provision was contained in the Senate amendment. The substitute adopts the provision of the House bill with a clerical change.

EXAMINATION OF BOOKS AND ACCOUNTS OF BOARD

The House bill (sec. 10) and the Senate amendment (sec. 12), which provided that vouchers approved by the chairman of the board for expenditures from the revolving fund should be final and conclusive on all officers of the Government and which provided that the General Accounting Office should examine such expenditures only for the purpose of making a report to Congress of expenditures and advances and of loan and insurance agreements made in violation of law, were substantially the same except for a provision in the Senate amendment which related to export debentures. The substitute (sec. 14) retains the provisions of the House bill with clerical changes found necessary in order that the language in this section should conform to the language of other portions of the substitute.

MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

The definition of the term "cooperative association" and the provisions prohibiting the members, officers, and employees of the board from speculating in agricultural commodities or food products thereof were identical in both the House bill (sec. 8 (b)) and the Senate amendment (sec. 14 (d)), and are therefore adopted in the substitute (sec. 15 (a) and (b)) without change.

The provisions of the House bill (sec. 8 (d)) and the Senate amendment (sec. 14 (c)) prohibiting cooperative associations, stabilization corporations, clearing-house associations, and advisory committees or any director, officer, or employee to which or to whom information has been imparted in confidence to disclose such information in violation of any regulation of the board, were substantially the same. The House bill, however, provided that such prohibition should extend to any member of such association, corporation, or committee, or any person acting on behalf of any such association, corporation, or committee, and except that the penalty provisions of the House bill provided for a fine of not more than $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than 10 years, or both. The Senate amendment provided for a fine of $2,000 or imprisonment for not more than two years, or both. The substitute (sec. 15 (c)) incorporates the provisions of the House bill, except that the penalty provisions are fixed at a fine of not to exceed $5,000 or imprisonment for not more than five years, or both.

The Senate amendment (sec. 14 (e)) contained a provision which prohibited the inclusion in any governmental report, bulletin, or other publication of any prediction with respect to the prices of cotton. No such provision was contained in the House bill. The Senate amendment is incorporated in the substitute with slight clerical changes. The penalty provisions contained in the Senate amendment have been reduced in the substitute from a fine of not less than $1,000 or more than $10,000 to a fine of not less than $500 or more than $5,000.

The Senate amendment (sec. 14 (a)) contained a separability clause which did not appear in the House bill and which is adopted in the substitute (sec. 15 (e)).

The House bill (sec. 11) provided that the act may be cited as the "Federal farm board act" and the Senate amendment (sec. 14 (g)) provided that the act may be cited as the "Agricultural surplus control act." The substitute (sec. 15 (f)) provides that the act may be cited as the "agricultural marketing act."

EXPORT DEBENTURES

The Senate amendment provided for the issuance of export debentures by the Secretary of Agriculture to exporters of agricultural commodities or their products. The debenture rates were one-half the rate of tariff duty in effect with respect to the particular commodity, except that so long as no import duty was imposed on cotton the debenture rate thereon would be 2 cents per pound. Proportionate rates were provided for products of the commodity. Debentures if presented within one year were receivable at face value in payment of duties collectible against any imported articles. In order to prevent undue stimulation in the production of any commodity by reason of the issuance of debentures, reductions in debenture rates were authorized. The greater the increase in production over the average annual production for the preceding five years, the greater the amount of the reduction in the debenture.

The House bill contained no provision upon this subject, and the substitute likewise omits the debenture provisions.

G. N. HAUGEN,
FRED S. PURNELL,
T. S. WILLIAMS,
J. B. ASWELL,
D. H. KINCHELOE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, the bill agreed upon in conference is identical with the House provisions, with the exception of a few amendments. I shall refer to a few of the amendments.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. ASWELL. How much time will we have?

Mr. HAUGEN. I expect to yield 20 minutes to the gentleman, if that is agreeable.

Mr. ASWELL. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, the bill agreed upon in conference is, as I said, practically the same as it passed the House, with a few amendments. I shall undertake to call attention to a few of the amendments agreed upon in conference.

Section 1, relating to the declaration of policy, is identical with the House provision, except it adds a definition of surpluses in the following language:

> There shall be considered as a surplus for the purposes of this act any seasonal or year's total surplus, produced in the United States and either local or national in extent, that is in excess of the requirements for the orderly distribution of the agricultural commodity or is in excess of the domestic requirements for such commodity.

That is the only amendment. Section 2 of the House bill created a farm board to consist of five members, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; the chairman of the board to be appointed by the President and his term and salary to be fixed by the President; and the Secretary of Agriculture to be an ex officio member of the board. The Senate amendment created a board of 12 members, 1 to be appointed from each of the 12 land-bank districts, the salaries of all to be $12,000. The conferees agreed upon a membership of eight, and the salary of all is fixed at $12,000, the Secretary of Agriculture to be an ex officio member of the board. The board is to appoint a vice chairman, who shall act as chairman in case of absence or disability of the chairman. The conferees agreed upon 8 members, 2 to serve for 1 year, 2 to serve for 2 years, and the remaining members to serve for 3, 4, 5, and 6 years, and thereafter for 6-year terms.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS. I want to ask the gentleman if there is any provision in the bill looking to at least a suggestion to the President that these members of the board shall be appointed with reference to the major agricultural products of the country and also as to the various sections of the country.

Mr. HAUGEN. I will read the provision.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. In section 2, appearing on page 2 of the report, is a provision that the Federal farm board shall consist of so many members, and so on, and then there is the provision that in making the appointments the President shall give due consideration to having the major agricultural commodities produced in the United States fairly represented upon the board.

Mr. BYRNS. That is the only provision?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. That is the only provision which in any way undertakes to limit or direct the President.

Mr. BYRNS. Is there anything in the bill with reference to the location of the various members of the board?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Nothing at all.

Mr. BYRNS. Nor as to politics?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. That is correct.

Mr. BYRNS. I am sure the gentleman agrees with me that it should be a nonpartisan board?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Absolutely.

Mr. HAUGEN. Section 2 (b), relating to general powers, provided that the principal office of the board shall be located in the Department of Agriculture. The Senate provision provides that it shall be maintained in the District of Columbia. The Senate amendment was agreed to.

Section 3 relates to the designation of agricultural commodities. The House provision is agreed to with an amendment as provided in the Senate amendment as follows:

shall meet at the call of the chairman, the Secretary of Agriculture, or a majority of its members.

The House bill did not specify when the meetings were to be held.

Section 3 (b) relates to commodity advisory committees. The House provision is agreed to, with an amendment as provided in the Senate amendment as follows:

Each advisory committee shall be designated by the name of the commodity it represents, as, for example, the "cotton advisory committee."

(c) Each advisory committee shall meet as soon as practicable after its selection, at a time and place designated by the board. Each advisory committee shall meet thereafter at least twice a year upon call of the board, and may meet at other times upon call of a majority of the members thereof. Each advisory committee shall select a chairman and secretary.

(d) Each advisory committee may by itself or through its officers (1) confer directly with the board, call for information from it, or make oral or written representations to it, concerning matters within the jurisdiction of the board and relating to the agricultural commodity, and (2) cooperate with the board in advising the producers through their organizations or otherwise in the development of suitable programs of planting or breeding in order to secure the maximum benefits under this act consistent with the policy declared in section 1.

That is the Senate provision. As to section 4, the House provision provides that the board shall keep advised from available sources and make reports as to crop prices, and so forth; to make investigations and report upon the economic need for reclamation and irrigation projects, but the words "economic need for reclamation and irrigation projects" were stricken from the bill.

Section 5 relates to the revolving fund. The House provision is agreed to with an amendment to strike out "all such loans shall bear interest at the rate to be fixed by the board," and the Senate amendment is agreed to as follows:

SEC. 8. (a) Loans to any cooperative association or stabilization corporation and advances for insurance purposes shall bear interest at a rate of interest per annum equal to the lowest rate of yield (to the nearest one-eighth of 1 per cent) of any Government obligation bearing a date of issue subsequent to April 6, 1917 (except postal-savings bonds), and outstanding at the time the loan agreement is entered into or the advance is made by the board, as certified by the Secretary of the Treasury to the board upon its request: Provided, That in no case shall the rate exceed 4 per cent per annum on the unpaid principal.

Also to strike out of the House provision the following:

Repayment of principal on any loans or advances shall be covered into the revolving fund, and payment of interest of any loan or advance shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

And the Senate amendment is agreed to, as follows:

(b) Payments of principal or interest upon any such loan or advance shall be covered into the revolving fund.

Referring to subsection (3) of section 5, the House bill provides—that no loans for the construction, purchase, or lease of facilities shall be made unless the cooperative association demonstrates to the satisfaction of the board that there are not available suitable facilities—

And the provision is agreed to with an amendment to strike out the words "the cooperative association demonstrates to the satisfaction of."

Another Senate amendment is agreed to, as follows:

(5) Enabling the cooperative association applying for the loan to advance to its members a greater share of the market price of the commodity delivered to the association than is practicable under other credit facilities.

And as follows:

All losses of the corporation from such operations shall be paid from such reserves, or if such reserves are inadequate, then such losses shall be paid by the board as a loan from the revolving fund. Any amount so loaned for payment of losses shall be repaid into the revolving fund by the corporation from future profits from its surplus-control operations.

Section 5 (c) relates to clearing-house associations. The House provision is agreed to, with an amendment striking out the following:

And provided further, That such clearing-house association shall operate under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the board.

Also inserting after the word "registration" the words "and for the termination of registration," as provided in the Senate amendment.

Also the amendment, as provided in the Senate amendment, as follows:

The association shall utilize the market news service and other facilities of the Department of Agriculture as far as possible.

Section 6. Stabilization corporations: The House provisions are agreed to, except subsection (b), which has been redrafted, embodying certain provisions of the Senate amendment. The time will not permit at this time to go into detail. The redraft of this section is clearly set up on pages 15 and 16 of the report.

The debenture provision has been eliminated.

Mr. WINGO. Right on that point, it has been suggested to me that this farm board could use the debenture plan if it saw fit and found it necessary. Is that true?

Mr. HAUGEN. No; it is not included in the bill.

Section 7 relates to cooperation with Government departments. The Senate provision is agreed to, with an amendment inserting the words "including any field service thereof at home or abroad" after the word "Government" in the third line of the section.

Section 8: For administrative expenses the House bill authorized to be appropriated $1,500,000. The Senate provided an authorization of appropriation of $500,000; and the House provision is agreed to.

Section 9 provided that the President is authorized by Executive order to transfer or retransfer the whole or any part of any office. The House provision is agreed to.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I understand that if this goes through, then the money will be available so that this law may go into operation immediately?

Mr. HAUGEN. It will be for the Committee on Appropriations and Congress to appropriate the money. It is being authorized in this bill.

Mr. ABERNETHY. That is the gentleman's understanding—it will be made available?

Mr. HAUGEN. My understanding is that it will be; yes.

Mr. CHALMERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. CHALMERS. Do you make any recommendation as to how much of the $500,000,000 shall be made available at once?

Mr. HAUGEN. The recommendation is that the entire $500,000,000 shall be made available and that it may be drawn as needed.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. On page 6 of your report, subdivision (b), I find this language:

Any stabilization corporation for an agricultural commodity (1) may act as a marketing agency for its stockholders or members in preparing, handling, storing, processing, and merchandising for their account any quantity of the agricultural commodity or its food products,— and (2) for the purpose of controlling any surplus in the commodity in furtherance of the policy declared in section 1, may prepare, purchase, handle, store, process, and merchandise otherwise than for the account of its stockholders or members, any quantity of the agricultural commodity or its food products, whether or not such commodity or products are acquired from its stockholders or members.

A comma, not a semicolon—

The last few lines, to me, are about as clear as mud. Will the chairman tell us what they mean?

Here is the point I have in mind, I will say to the gentleman; I read subdivision (b) and I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that (1) and (2) in subdivision (b) are separated by a comma.

Mr. HAUGEN. It reads, "may prepare, purchase, handle, store, process, and merchandise."

Mr. WINGO. Yes; I have read that. I imagine what you are trying to do is to authorize unrestricted open-market operations? Is that true?

Mr. HAUGEN. It says to handle, store, purchase, and merchandise.

Mr. WINGO. Notwithstanding what was said in the debate before, the phrase "open-market operations" has a well-understood meaning as used in the Federal reserve act. "Open-market operations" means to purchase and sell without restriction to members of the organization engaging in the operation. It means to buy or sell from or to any person or corporation, whether they are stockholders in the stabilizing corporations or nonmembers, and is this language intended to give them that authority?

Mr. HAUGEN. Merchandising includes selling and purchasing. There is no question about that.

Mr. WINGO. Does subdivision (b) authorize these stabilization corporations to buy and sell in the open market without regard to whether the persons from whom they buy or to whom they sell are members of a cooperative association or not?

Mr. HAUGEN. It simply provides here that the stabilization corporation——

Mr. WINGO. I know what it states; I want to know what it means.

Mr. HAUGEN. It means exactly what it states—merchandising.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. That refers only to when the stabilization corporation goes out to stabilize the price and to buy in the open market and not to dealing with its members.

Mr. WINGO. In the open market?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. In the open market.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman from Iowa will permit, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether there is any restriction upon their open-market operations. Can the stabilization corporations buy and sell in the open market without regard to whether the purchaser, when they sell, or the seller, when they buy, is a member or stockholder of the stabilization corporation or not?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire in whose time the gentleman is speaking?

Mr. WINGO. I was not speaking. I stated that with the permission of the chairman, who yielded, I would ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. I have asked the question. Will the gentleman please answer?

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL].

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE].

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield for a question before he starts?

Mr. KINCHELOE. I want to explain this bill if I can, but I will yield.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman, in the course of his remarks, answer the last question I asked the chairman [Mr. HAUGEN] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS], and which they side-stepped and did not answer?

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, nobody is side-stepping anything. That is a very simple question to answer, and I may suggest to the gentleman that if he will wait a moment the question will be fully answered.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield for this discussion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LEHLBACH). The gentleman from Kentucky has the floor and declines to yield.

Mr. WINGO. I admit it was a very simple question that could have been answered, yes or no. I shall await the answer.

Mr. PURNELL. The gentleman might not be able to submit any other kind. [Laughter.]

Mr. WINGO. Even if I were able, I should not think of asking the gentleman any other kind of question.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, in the very short time that we have under the rules on the conference report, if you will indulge me I want to discuss the report and show what changes there are from the original bill as it passed the House, and the only way I know to do it is to follow the bill, and I hope you gentlemen all have before you the bill and the report.

There is no change to amount to anything in the declaration of policy. Consequently I shall not touch upon that.

The House provision with respect to the Federal farm board provided for six members and the Secretary of Agriculture. The conference report provides for eight members and the Secretary of Agriculture. The House bill provided that all the members of the board except the chairman should draw $12,000 a year, of course, all to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, except that the House provision provided that the salary of the chairman of the board and his term of office should be fixed by the President.

The House conferees yielded on that. So we now have a board of eight members and the Secretary of Agriculture and the salary is to be $12,000 a year for the chairman and for each member of the board.

The provision with respect to the advisory commodity committees is just the same as it was in the House except as to its meetings. In the House provision we provided that they should meet upon call of the board except that they should meet at least once a year. We agreed to an amendment that provides they may meet at least twice a year upon the call of the board and may meet at other times when a majority of the members thereof asks for a meeting.

Under the House bill the offices of the farm board were to be in the Department of Agriculture. We yielded on that and provided that the offices of the board should be in the District of Columbia, not necessarily in the Department of Agriculture. Of course, the idea of the House bill was not only to save office rent but that they might be close to the department where they could get information.

Under the special powers of the board the substitute bill contains the identical provisions of the House bill with the exception of omitting the requirement that the board shall have authority to make investigations and report upon the economic needs for reclamation and irrigation projects.

In section 8 (a) we agree to a provision providing for loans to any cooperative associations, stabilization corporations, clearing-house associations, and so forth, and that the rate of interest shall be the same as now provided in the Shipping Board act.

The House bill provided that no loan or insurance agreement should be made to the board if, in its judgment, the agreement is likely to increase unduly the production of any agricultural commodity, of which there is commonly produced a surplus in excess of the annual domestic requirements. When this provision was discussed on the floor of the House, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL] offered an amendment to strike out the word "domestic" and insert the word "marketing." Also the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] made an able speech in behalf of this amendment, but the amendment was defeated.

The conferees of the House, on their own initiative, got the Senate conferees to yield, and they have put in the word "marketing" instead of "domestic."

The stabilization corporation provision, the most important part of the bill, was rewritten.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KINCHELOE. I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman please tell the distinction between a distribution of and excess of domestic requirement and the distribution of any excess in market requirements. What is the difference?

Mr. KINCHELOE. It would take considerable time to explain that, but the reason we changed that is that we always have an excess of domestic requirements of certain commodities, like wheat, cotton, and some tobacco. If we confined ourselves to the language of the original House bill provision, the domestic requirement, it always exists, and therefore, in my judgment, the board would be prevented from making any loans at all on some classes of tobacco, wheat, or cotton, and so we put in the word "marketing" instead of "domestic." In other words, I do not think wheat, cotton, and some parts of tobacco could get any loan at all under the original House provision.

The House bill provided for the creation of stabilization corporations for two purposes: First, to act as a marketing agency for its stockholders or members; and, second, for controlling any surplus in the commodity in furtherance of the policy declared in section 1. The conferees rewrote this section, which is section 9 in the conference report, but the stabilization corporation has the same powers as it had in the original bill.

But the stabilization corporation when it borrows money for the purpose of marketing the products of the cooperatives can not borrow money for the purpose of equipment. That is one difference. Secondly, as I say, they borrow for the purpose of controlling the surplus, and taking it off the market, and I want to read this that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] was so anxious about:

(2) For the purpose of controlling any surplus in the commodity in furtherance of the policy declared in section 1, may prepare, purchase, handle, store, process, and merchandise, otherwise than for the account of its stockholders or members, any quantity of the agricultural commodity or its food products, whether or not such commodity or products are acquired from its stockholders or members.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LEHLBACH). The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Has the gentleman from Louisiana any more time?

Mr. ASWELL. The only time remaining that I have not promised is three minutes, and I yield those to the gentleman.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I thank my colleague. So then they can borrow, as I say, for the purpose of taking the products off the market in the case of a glut, and they can buy from an individual or their own members, or anybody else. If they borrow that money for marketing purposes, they must take 75 per cent of their profit and put it into the surplus fund for this purpose, provided there is not already a sufficient surplus fund in there to put this over, and to make it a safe transaction. Then, after they put 75 per cent in there, the other 25 per cent may be used for one of two purposes, or both; first, to pay back to the board any loans outstanding from the revolving fund, from which it was borrowed for the purpose of marketing, and then, if there is anything left in the way of profit, it goes to the stockholders of this stabilization corporation. Personally, if I had my way about it, I would not put the question of marketing in the stabilization corporation at all. I should confine it simply to the purpose of taking the surplus off the market; but we have done it and I think it is safe, because they can borrow only for marketing purposes, they can not borrow for facilities, and, therefore, the member cooperatives of the stabilization corporation, when the stabilization corporation markets for them, must furnish equipment, must furnish all the capital practically; and I do not see how the stabilization corporation would ever lose a dollar in marketing but I was just a little bit afraid that there would be duplication of effort between the member cooperatives and the stabilization corporation itself in this field of endeavor. Under that provision no loss comes out of the Treasury, but it does provide in subsection (d), where they borrow the money for the purpose of relieving a congested market, that they must maintain a reserve, and then if they lose that reserve and they make any more money in subsequent transactions in after years, they have to pay it back, but if they lose entirely, it specifically provides that whatever loss the stabilization corporation eventually suffers by reason of taking any surplus crop off the market in order to stimulate the price, then the loss eventually will come out of the Federal Treasury, if the reserve is all wiped out.

The insurance provision of the House bill was stricken out entirely and the Senate provision was inserted, which is section 11 of the conference report. These, in substance, are the changes made in the House bill. However, all essential features of the House bill have been retained.

Mr. Chairman, the struggle for farm legislation in the House has been a long and tedious one. The first McNary-Haugen bill was introduced in the House on January 16, 1924, and hearings began January 21 of the same year. This bill was defeated in the House. Then what are known as two more McNary-Haugen bills were passed by both Houses of Congress and vetoed by the President. So the Committee on Agriculture, of which I have the honor to be a member, has been making every effort to enact some farm legislation that would redound to benefit agriculture for over five years. I believe that this bill is sound in every particular. It will not, in my judgment, rehabilitate agriculture over night. I have every reason to believe that the President of the United States will appoint a brainy and sympathetic farm board to administer this law. I have gained that impression in every conference that I have had with him. With a brainy and sympathetic farm board and a revolving fund of $500,000,000 to assist in the rehabilitation of agriculture, I think that agricultural products will be stabilized and that seasonal gluts will not occur. As I said in my speech when this legislation was pending before the House, I made up my mind before I came to Washington to attend this extra session that I was going to do everything I could as a member of the Committee on Agriculture to secure the best farm bill possible that would be signed by the President, and that no politics would enter into my activities in this matter. I am glad to say that there has been no politics in the framing of this bill by the Subcommittee on Agriculture, or the Agricultural Committee, and certainly there has been no politics with the five conferees of the House in its deliberations with the conferees of the Senate. If I have been of service in this matter I am happy, because no one in Congress wants to see agriculture rehabilitated any more than I do and I think this is a great step in the right direction. If the bill is imperfect, Congress will be in session all the time and it can be amended. No great constructive piece of legislation was ever perfect in the first law enacted. I sincerely trust that this legislation will be of great service to the farmers of the Nation, and I heartily thank the House for its cooperation with the Committee on Agriculture and the conferees in the passage of this bill. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has again expired.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I think the conferees have very materially improved this bill, but I think they overlooked the greatest opportunity to improve the bill which was offered to them. I do not believe anyone would undertake to offer the so-called debenture plan as an original proposition, but as a part of the tariff system I do not believe a man lives who can deny its logic or its justice. It has been frequently stated that a protective tariff tends to protect the home-market manufacturer against the cheap foreign laborer. The cotton producer, and in large measure the wheat producer, must not only compete with cheap foreign labor but with the added handicap of a higher market in which he must buy his supplies. My chief purpose in rising to-day is to call attention to two or three different forms of export premium. Some of the big newspapers of this country through their editorial columns have pronounced the export premium plan a subsidy. I call attention to the fact that the method, if it be a subsidy, is not new.

A subsidy is a subsidy, whatever its name. For many years the railway rates from interior points to points of exportation have been very much less when the manufactured article was destined to a foreign country than the rates on such articles when intended for domestic use.

I recently asked the Interstate Commerce Commission about these rates, with special reference to some of the items. I find that farm implements, when they are intended for use in this country, bear a rate almost twice as high as the same implements bear when they are intended for use in foreign countries. For instance, farm implements shipped from Chicago, Ill., to San Francisco, Calif., for export trade carry a railway rate of $1 per hundred; if they are intended for domestic use the freight charge is $1.93 per hundred. This is a direct export bounty or premium. If it is all right to pay an export premium in the form of reduced rates which must be made up in the rise of the general rate structure of the country for the exportation of farm implements which the farmer must buy when he produces surplus crops, is it unfair to allow him an export premium on his surplus commodity which he ships abroad and which he produces with those farm implements?

Farm implements shipped from Cincinnati, Ohio, to New Orleans, La., bear a rate of 38½ cents per hundred if intended for the export trade and 69 cents per hundred if they are intended for domestic use.

In other words, loading them at the same station and unloading them at the same station, freight rates are nearly twice as much on farm implements when purchased by the farmers of this country than when they go into export trade. I would like some of these newspapers which have been crying subsidy to think about that, and I appeal to the press gallery to carry that to the country. I know the newspapers want to be fair. Let them tell us editorially just why an export premium on farm products is a subsidy and why an export premium in the form of reduced railway rates for exports of manufactured commodities is merely good business.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the gentleman from Texas.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is the point of order?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. The gentleman is addressing the gallery and not addressing the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS] should be an expert in addressing the press gallery, and I yield to his superior wisdom on that. I just want to say this: Two or three times the gentleman who writes the "blister column" for the Washington Post—though I understand now that he has transferred his affections—Mr. George Rothwell Brown, has referred to the debenture as a subsidy. I recognize in Mr. Brown a brilliant and intelligent man, and I pay tribute to brilliance and intelligence wherever I find them. But I would like for him to write in his column what he thinks about the export premium which is allowed in the form of reduced railway rates on export steel of about 50 per cent. I am going to put into the RECORD a number of those steel rates that are reduced around 50 per cent, which have been in effect nearly 30 years.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Does the gentleman say the foreigner receives cheaper freight rates than the American?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes. A foreigner, when he buys an automobile, pays half rates and the American farmer pays full rates; and the same on steel; the same is true of farm implements.

There are no such reduced rates on export cotton. True, only recently a small reduction on export wheat was allowed, but this is an emergency proposition; but the reductions on manufactured products mentioned are woven into the permanent rate structure of the country.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. RAGON. Who is responsible for that? Does the Government have anything to do with it?

Mr. JONES of Texas. The Interstate Commerce Commission—and the Congress created the Interstate Commerce Commission—has the power over these rates.

The United States Steel Co. and other steel companies pay 40 cents a hundred in freight rates from Chicago to San Francisco when intended for export and $1 per hundred when intended for domestic use. The dividends of the United States Steel Co. for the past 26 years have ranged from 4 per cent to above 30 per cent per annum, averaging a dividend of 12.77 per cent on its common stock per annum for the last 26 years. I am not attacking the steel company. I glory in the success of American business institutions. I ask the big newspapers of the country to state editorially whether that export premium is justified. If one is justified, why is not the other? Why has cotton, the greatest export commodity in America, never had these preferential rates?

Mr. ADKINS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Not now. Is it just and fair to give these reduced rates to the steel companies when their goods are shipped for export and not do the same for the farmers?

Let me give you a few more instances. On automobiles from Cleveland to New Orleans, La., the rate is $1.04 per hundred for export and $2.46 a hundred for domestic use. From Moline, Ill., to New Orleans the rate for export is 84 cents and for domestic use twice as much. The consumer who lives around New Orleans when he buys a car must pay twice as much freight from Moline to New Orleans as is charged if the car goes to a foreign consumer.

I ask why the controlling authorities who have permitted these export premiums for 30 years are so outraged when a premium is suggested for the farmer. I do not say that in order to stimulate the world trade these preferential rates are not justified. The rate structure of this country is a tremendously intricate one. I would not undertake to pass judgment on that; but I do insist that if it is fair to say to the steel concerns and the automobile concerns and the farm-implement manufacturers that they shall have a subsidy in the form of reduced rates why would it not be fair to say that the farmer in shipping his products abroad should also have reduced rates or an export premium?

I have fought to the best of my ability to secure a farm bill that will place agriculture and industry on an equal basis before the law. While this is not my ideal of a bill, the last opportunity to change it has passed. The gentleman from Kentucky has just stated that subdivision (d) of section 8 has been so changed as to leave no doubt that loans may be made for crops that are annually produced above the domestic requirements. This is also in accordance with my understanding of the language. I therefore withdraw any opposition to the bill. I shall hope for success for the measure and shall be happy to contribute in any way to that success.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert two letters from the Interstate Commerce Commission, giving various rates on which the export rate is cheaper than the local rate, and also to insert a statement showing the profits of the United States Steel Co. since 1901. These merely for the purpose of showing that there is at least no greater need for a premium on export steel than on cotton or other surplus farm commodity.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LOUIS R. DEROUEN.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the attention of the Members of the House, and particularly the attention of the House conferees on this bill.

First I want to express my appreciation of the action of the conferees incorporating in the conference report language which effects a very important improvement in the bill. I understand those changes were effected at the suggestion of the House conferees. I refer to the changes in subsection (d) of section 8 of the conference report which was subsection (e), section 5, of the House bill. I am grateful to those gentleman for that modification.

In view, however, of certain language remaining in the bill and the broad discretion with which the board is to be intrusted, I would like to have incorporated in the RECORD, as a construction of the whole bill before the House votes on the conference report, an answer to this question: Is it a fact that the conference report as agreed upon gives to the producers of exportable surpluses the same benefits under the bill which are given to producers whose sales are limited to the domestic market, and that in practical operation "surplus" as applied to commodities produced for the world market, would be that part of the production in excess of world requirements?

Mr. PURNELL. I think there is no question but that section 8 (d), which retains the House provision as modified, limits the restriction to commodities of which there is an excess in domestic and foreign markets.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. How does the gentleman answer my question?

Mr. PURNELL. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I am glad to be able now to vote for the conference report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes, the remainder of my time, to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, the farm bill has been improved, in my judgment, by a number of helpful amendments.

The membership of the board has been increased to nine, including the eight members, and the salaries of all definitely fixed at $12,000 per annum.

The bill as it passed the House made a strange departure from our usual method of legislating by making the term of the chairman uncertain and permitting the President to fix the salary. Both of these have been corrected. It is inconceivable to me that any Member should have voted against either of these amendments while the bill was pending in the House. If such a departure had been enacted into this law, the same argument for indefinite terms of service and for authority to fix the salary of any official would have been used during the consideration of practically every piece of legislation to come up hereafter in Congress for consideration. It would have established a dangerous precedent. The responsibility is with Congress. We should assume it, and I am glad that this conference report makes these corrections.

Another helpful amendment which a number of us urged while the bill was under consideration in the House is that contained in subdivision 5, section 7, authorizing loans from the revolving fund to cooperative associations for the purpose of—

(5) enabling the cooperative association applying for the loan to advance to its members a greater share of the market price of the commodity delivered to the association than is practicable under other credit facilities.

I invited attention to the fact, while this bill was pending, that the language was not explicit in this regard and that it would not, in my judgment, authorize these advances to be made and that the language should be more definite and specific. The language of the bill should not be made to conceal the purposes of the legislation, but should always be clear and specific. This provision authorizes these loans to be made for the purpose of making these advances pending the marketing of farm products.

Another helpful amendment is found in subdivision (a) of section 8, fixing the rate of interest on loans made from the revolving fund to any cooperative association or stabilization corporation and advances for insurance purposes which shall bear interest equal to the lowest rate of yield of any Government obligation, with the proviso that in no case should it exceed 4 per cent. This amendment was urged while the bill was in the House for consideration. The House during the consideration of the bill was in no mood for any amendment, and it was found that it was determined by those in charge of the bill to pass it without amendment as reported, and to adopt no constructive suggestions, however helpful, that were offered. This amendment will enable these associations and corporations to figure with certainty and definiteness the amount of interest they will be required to pay.

Another beneficial amendment authorizes the board to maintain its principal office in the District of Columbia and does not require it in the Department of Agriculture. It lifts it from the status of a subordinate bureau dominated completely by the Secretary of Agriculture to the prestige and dignity of an independent board. It will result in greater independence and freedom of action.

One other suggestion which I urged in the House was not incorporated into the bill and that was to authorize the board to enter into agreements of insurance of the stabilization corporations against loss through price decline, the same that is done with cooperative associations. I see no reason why this insurance should not be extended to stabilization corporations. It would be a most helpful amendment, and I regret it is not incorporated in this bill.

Another constructive criticism which I desire to make is that in my judgment the powers conferred upon the stabilization corporation, if I may use the term, are too hazy and are not sufficiently definite, and I fear that disappointment will be voiced throughout the country by those who read and attempt to analyze the bill, that the authority conferred upon stabilization corporations, and the methods to be used, are not enacted in clearer language or more definite detail.

As I took occasion to say when this bill was before the House for consideration, I regard it as the first step and believe that its benefits are largely educational and that, in my judgment, it would lead to recommendations by the board and to more helpful and beneficial legislation to place agriculture on a parity with industry.

Much will depend upon the personnel of the board appointed to administer the law. If a broad-minded, sympathetic board is appointed, familiar with agriculture and agricultural conditions, it can and will be helpful to agriculture. Everyone appreciates the depressed condition of the farmer, and while I share the opinion that this bill should go much further, I regard it as the first step. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COLE].

Mr. COLE. Mr. Speaker, I have taken some pains to prepare a statement on the effect of countervailing duties on debentures. I had hoped to get time enough to permit me to present it in connection with this conference report. But the time is limited to one hour, so that we may get this important legislation back to the Senate, and there are many here who are more entitled to that time than I am, men who deserve to be heard, for they have perfected a splendid piece of legislation.

And so I am going to ask permission to extend my remarks on this subject of countervailing duties as offsets for the proposed debentures—and I hope, and I know, you will all want to read my statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Speaker, now that the debentures amendment has been eliminated from the farm bill, it may be pertinent to call attention to the fact that the benefits which would have accrued to producers were more hypothetical than real.

The assumption has been that these debentures would be automatically added to the prices received by the producers. On that assumption a Member from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] stated on the floor the other day that if these debentures were now paid farmers would be getting the benefit of them, and I think he computed these benefits in actual dollars and cents.

He did not take into consideration that these debentures would be paid to exporters, and that they are available only in payment of import duties. In the ordinary processes of business the exporter who receives these debenture certificates, not being an importer, would sell them to an importer, probably through some Wall Street broker. Needless to say there would be discounts and commissions and other coverage charges so well known in the business world. The chances are that there would be little left for the actual producer to be reflected back in the form of higher prices. These gains fluently promised may be likened to the mythical gains of the woman who carried the famous basket of eggs on her head, but stumbled before the chickens were hatched.

But there is a more serious phase of this question that I want to set forth briefly this morning. It is one that has been almost ignored in the debates on this question. I refer to the effect of what are known as countervailing duties, which would be offsets for these proposed debentures. At my request, the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce of the Department of Commerce has furnished me with information as to these countervailing duties in the tariff laws of foreign countries. It is disclosed that such duties are provided for in the tariff laws of practically all countries, both in Europe and the Orient, and those who are not so provided can quickly enact them, or have other means of making such countering effective. In Great Britain and in Canada we know that such things can be done through what are called "orders in council," which can be promulgated to meet any contingency and that overnight.

What are countervailing duties? To countervail literally means to oppose with equal power. As used in tariff laws, they mean to offset in an importing country any bounty, privilege, or other benefit granted in an exporting country.

In our own country we are firmly and consistently committed to a system of countervailing duties, and we have repeately made use of them. Such duties have been embodied in tariff acts framed by both Republicans and Democrats. In the tariff act of 1922 they are found in section 303, and this section is copied word for word into the bill which the House has just sent to the Senate. Here is some of the language:

> Whenever any country, dependency, colony, province, or other subdivision of government, person, partnership, association, cartel, or corporation shall pay or bestow, directly or indirectly, any bounty or grant upon the manufacture or production or export of any article or merchandise manufactured or produced in such country, dependency, colony, province, or other political subdivision of government, and such article or merchandise is dutiable under the provisions of this act, then upon the importation of any such article or merchandise into the United States * * * there shall be levied and paid, in all such cases, in addition to the duties otherwise imposed by this act, an additional duty equal to the net amount of such bounty or grant, however the same be paid or bestowed.

Note how explicit the language is. It is both water-tight and air-tight. No nation can assist its exporters to get over our tariff barriers, directly or indirectly, without encountering the American customs collector. The amount of the countervailing duties which the collector must add must be the net equivalent of the bounties or benefits paid or bestowed by the exporting country.

It will be recalled that during the McKinley administration our Treasury Department imposed such countervailing duties against somewhat indirectly subsidized sugar from Russia. The importer protested the payment of the additional duty on the ground that the advantage enjoyed could not be construed as a bounty or subsidy. The issue was tried in our courts, not in theirs, with the result that the American Treasury was enriched exactly to the extent that the Russian Government had attempted to assist her exporters of beet sugar. (In the Supreme Court case of Downs v. United States.) The bounty went into the Treasury of the United States and did not accrue to the benefit of the Russian sugar producers or the exporter thereof.

I might cite many more cases. The Bureau of Customs informs me that at the present time the United States is levying countervailing duties on sugar, jams, confections, butter, and fencing wire exported from Australia under bounty or other stimulation.

From the same source I have the information that we are levying such countervailing duties on spun silk yarn from Great Britain.

Is it reasonable to suppose that Australia and Great Britain would treat our debenture-fed exports to them more leniently than we do theirs? Or have our political theorists evolved the doctrine that in trade and commerce we do not do unto others as others do unto us?

The iniquity, at least the absurdity, of the proposed debentures consists, in part, in a brazen and unblushing attempt to do to other countries exactly what under both Republican and Democratic tariffs we have effectually prevented from being practiced on us. Is anyone foolish enough to think that we can do this, though we tried it by any manner of subterfuge of phraseology, when nearly all countries have laws like or similar to our own, and that those countries which have no express statutes on the subject have other methods of preventing invasions of their markets by artificially stimulated imports?

Is it reasonable to assume, I repeat, that other countries would permit from us what we prohibit from them? England, for instance, is just as ready to protect her loyal subjects in Canada and Australia against subsidized or bounty-fed or debenture-fed competition in her markets as we are to protect Americans in our own markets. And has not Germany, to cite another instance, ever been ready to go to extreme limits to protect her agriculture against such competition?

It will be recalled that in one case when Germany found herself unable to protect her hog growers under her tariff laws against the hog products of 20-cent corn fed in the Mississippi Valley, that she prohibited the importation of all American pork products on the alleged ground of the unwholesomeness of such products because of the prevalence of trichina, which, as a matter of fact, did not exist.

England is never asleep when trade policies and practices are at stake. Recently when the railroads, at the suggestion of President Hoover, reduced freight rates on wheat from the interior to the seacoast to facilitate disposal of the surplus, the 6 or 7 cents were immediately reflected in the Liverpool prices, thus translating the bounty of our railroad into benefits for the British consumers of wheat.

What Canada's attitude is on such matters we know also. When bounty-fed butter from Australia was offered in her ports she added countervailing duties in equivalent amount to protect her own butter producers.

When New Zealand proposed to offset the increased duty on butter from 8 to 12 cents a pound, under the proclamation of President Coolidge she was notified that any such bounty paid would be added to our existing tariff duty under section 303 of the tariff act.

Let us take a concrete illustration of the operation of such countervailing duties. The duty on lard is 1 cent a pound. The debenture that would be paid to the exporter of lard would be one-half of that duty, or one-half of 1 cent a pound. The packer exports the lard and receives his debenture certificate. At the foreign port he would encounter an equivalent countervailing duty. The benefit which he received on the American side would be offset by an equivalent penalty on the foreign side. He would get no more for his lard by reason of the debenture, and therefore he could not pay more for the hogs from which the lard is derived.

As a matter of fact, the debenture would be a handicap instead of a benefit in such case. The debenture certificates are good only in payment of import duties. But the exporter is not an importer, and so he would have to sell his certificate to some importer, probably, as already stated, through some Wall Street broker. In order to break even he would have to deduct from the price paid to the farmer for his hogs the discount he would be compelled to accept on his debenture plus a reasonable charge for interest on the countervailing duties he would have to pay in advance on the other side of the ocean.

In such transactions the total face value of the debenture would be taken out of the Treasury of the United States in an indirect way and be transferred to the treasury of the foreign country in a very direct way. Does anyone doubt who would be the ultimate loser?

Instead of being styled an amendment for the benefit of agriculture, these debentures might more properly be styled a device to enrich foreign treasuries at the expense of the American Treasury.

Those who put their trust in such promises of politicians may sit down with the psalmist to eat "ashes like bread." [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PURNELL].

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, obviously in four minutes none of us can hope to discuss more than two or three of the high spots of this bill. Personally I am very much delighted that in coming back to the House with this conference report we are able to report the elimination of the so-called debenture plan. [Applause.] For the benefit of the House, as well as the country, and without discussing the merits or demerits of the debenture plan, we recognize the fact that the debenture plan and the equalization fee were not discussed in the last campaign; they were not written into any party platform; and that the incorporation of either in a farm relief bill at this time could result in but one thing, namely, no farm relief legislation.

In addition, the President of the United States, who must of necessity be the head of this great organization and responsible for the success or failure of the board which he creates, has expressed himself as opposed to the debenture plan, and therefore without going into the question of its merits, the House conferees regarded it as an absolute waste of time to discuss it. [Applause.] After five days of watchful waiting on the part of the House conferees, during which time nothing was done, we began the consideration of the other points of controversy in the bill and now bring back to the House what, in my judgment, is the best farm relief bill ever presented to the Congress of the United States. [Applause.]

This bill, in my judgment, is an improvement in many respects over the House bill. We have retained, with one or two exceptions, all of the major features of importance which were in the original House bill. Personally, I reluctantly yielded upon that provision in our bill which gave to the President the power to appoint the chairman of the board and fix his salary. I still think it was a mistake to take out this provision. I wanted the President of the United States to go out into the highways and byways and do exactly what big business does—select the best man to be found and pay him in accordance with his ability [applause], because that man, whoever he may be, will head the greatest marketing organization that has ever been set up in this country.

In my judgment, the next 10 days will see the enactment into law of this farm relief bill and a realization of the dreams of many of us who have worked in season and out for the last 10 years to bring this about. I undertake to predict further, that in a short time farm products in this country will feel very keenly the helpful effect of this new legislation.

Mr. FORT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PURNELL. I yield to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. FORT. I am very much interested in the gentleman's views, as one of the conferees, as to whether it is his sense, and as he understands it, that of the other conferees, that in the stabilization corporation provisions, the board, in approving the by-laws of such a corporation may insist upon such conditions as will protect the Government against undue loss or liability from unwise operations of the corporation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, may I have one minute more, because I think this is an important question?

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. PURNELL. I want to say to the gentleman that if that is not true the House conferees are mistaken. We believe absolutely that the board has the power to so protect the funds in the revolving fund and hedge them about with by-laws, rules, regulations, or whatever else may be necessary so as to reduce such losses to a minimum.

Mr. FORT. The board has that power?

Mr. PURNELL. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield for just a short question?

Mr. PURNELL. I am sorry, but before I sit down I want to express the appreciation that the Republican members of the conference have of the services rendered by the gentleman from Louisiana [Doctor ASWELL] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE]. [Applause.] I want to say that in the deliberations in connection with this bill, as well as in the consideration of bills previous to this, there has been no thought of politics on their part or our own, and that at all times they have been most helpful and fair in our common effort to place on the statute books a sound and constitutional farm relief measure. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS]. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I know the House is ready to vote, and, of course, I can not punish you very much in three minutes. I do want to say, however, that, in my judgment, the report of the conference committee which is now before the House brings back to the House a bill which in every vital sense retains the principles of the original House bill.

We have improved the bill. We had a fine conference. The conferees of the Senate and the conferees of the House, during the 10 days we discussed this bill, went over almost every line, especially every paragraph, of the bill, and the bill was improved.

The cardinal differences between the House bill and the Senate bill in which the conferees of the House felt they must sustain the House was with respect to the stabilization corporations and the commodity committees.

The House bill provided that these should be farmer-controlled agencies. The House bill provided that the commodity committees should be selected by the cooperatives themselves, while the Senate bill provided that the board should select the commodity committees. The provisions of the House bill are retained in the conference report.

The House bill provided that the stabilization corporations should be set up by cooperative organizations and that they should own all the stock in the corporations. The Senate bill provided that the board should organize the stabilization corporations and that the Government of the United States should subscribe to stock in the corporations which, in effect, put the Government of the United States squarely into the business of merchandising and marketing farm products. The bill we return to you now preserves the provisions of the House bill. [Applause.]

These agencies, the commodity committees and the stabilization corporations, are not Government instrumentalities. They are instrumentalities created, controlled, owned, and managed by the farmers of the United States themselves.

We bring back this bill in all of its essential features as it was passed by the House of Representatives. In my opinion, it carries out every promise made by the Republican Party at Kansas City covering farm relief legislation. There is written into the bill every pledge of President Hoover in his speech at St. Louis when he addressed himself to the subject of agriculture, and, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PURNELL] has said, it is the finest piece of legislation ever written upon the statute books of any country in the world in behalf of agriculture, and, under proper management, it will work and redeem the pledges of both major parties. [Applause.]

This bill marks the establishment of a definite agricultural program, one that will enable the farmers to control the marketing of their products. It will give them the bargaining power they do not now have. It is the maximum aid the Government can render agriculture. It helps the farmer to help himself and places him on an economic and commercial equality with those engaged in other industries.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. KETCHAM. Referring to section 13, paragraph (e), the language is, "The President is authorized, by Executive order, to transfer to or retransfer from the jurisdiction and control of the board the whole or any part of any office, bureau," and so forth. Does the gentleman interpret that to mean a retransfer of the officers from any department to the board and back to the department?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. If I transfer a thing from one place, I put it in another place, and when I retransfer it I put it back where it was, do I not? [Laughter.] That is what that language means.

Mr. KETCHAM. May I say that that was the interpretation of the committee, and I wanted it in the RECORD.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Yes; that is the plain meaning of the language of the paragraph to which the gentleman from Michigan refers. When the President retransfers an agency or a bureau he puts it back where it was before it was transferred to the board.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute on the conference report.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I object.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, it is a very pleasant duty I am about to perform, not in my capacity as majority leader but representing, as I believe, the sentiment of practically the entire House. We are approaching the final vote on one of the major measures which we were called together in extraordinary session to consider. Before we vote, I wish to present the congratulations and thanks of the membership of the House to the committee of conference on the part of the House that has handled so ably and effectively the farm relief bill. These five Members, three Republicans—Messrs. HAUGEN, of Iowa; PURNELL, of Indiana; and WILLIAMS of Illinois—and two Democrats—Messrs. ASWELL, of Louisiana; and KINCHELOE, of Kentucky—have labored long, faithfully, and with excellent results in bringing back here a bill which is deserving of the support of every Member of the House.

The motto of the House conferees must have been while considering this measure in conference, "In nonessentials be always conciliatory, in essentials remain adamant." They have brought back here substantially the bill that the House passed, and under considerable pressure have refused to bring back some provisions which would have made it impossible in the first place for the bill to become a law, and in the next place, if it had become a law, in my judgment, would have been more injurious than helpful to agriculture.

The rest of us, Members of the House who have not taken part in the conference, owe to these five conferees a debt of gratitude for their firmness, their sound judgment and tact, in so handling a difficult problem as to secure an outcome so satisfactory. [Applause.] In congratulating them upon the result of their work, I think that I voice the sentiment of the entire House when I say, Well done good and faithful conferees. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PURNELL, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 312) entitled "An act to provide for the fifteenth and subsequent decennial censuses and to provide for apportionment of Representatives in Congress," requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. JONES, Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. VANDENBERG, Mr. FLETCHER, and Mr. SHEPPARD to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

CENSUS AND APPORTIONMENT BILL

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 312) to provide for the fifteenth and subsequent decennial censuses and to provide for apportionment of Representatives in Congress, insist on the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked for.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 312, insist on the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked for. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. CHINDBLOM, Mr. FENN, Mr. MCLEOD, Mr. RANKIN, and Mr. GREENWOOD.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD] is unavoidably absent, and I suggest that the Speaker appoint some one in his place.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. LOZIER as one of the conferees in place of Mr. GREENWOOD.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS ON THE FARM RELIEF BILL AND CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have five legislative days to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the bill H. R. No. 1, and also on the conference report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

MUNICIPAL CENTER, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House Joint Resolution 97, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,000,000, to be paid in like manner as appropriations for other expenses of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, toward the acquisition of squares No. 490, 491, and 533, and reservation 10, in the District of Columbia, including buildings and other structures thereon as a site for a municipal center, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the establishment of a municipal center in the District of Columbia," approved February 28, 1929, to be available until expended. Of such amount not to exceed $10,000 shall be available for the employment by contract or otherwise for architectural and other professional services as shall be approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and without reference to the classification act of 1923, as amended.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what committee in the House reported on this?

Mr. WOOD. The deficiency subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. EDWARDS. But, as I understand, there has been no authorization by the House for this.

Mr. WOOD. The legislation was passed at the last session of Congress.

Mr. EDWARDS. I am on the Public Buildings and Grounds Committee and I do not recall that this has been authorized.

Mr. WOOD. Oh, yes. As I understand it, it came from the District Committee.

Mr. EDWARDS. If it has been authorized, very well. I did not recall it for the moment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOOD: Strike out all the matter in lines 5 and 6 and in line 7 up to the comma preceding the word "toward" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "to be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and the Treasury of the United States in the manner prescribed for defraying the expenses of the District of Columbia by the District of Columbia appropriation acts for the fiscal years during which payments hereunder may be made."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Not being acquainted with the legislation that was enacted in the last session of Congress, I wish the chairman would state generally what squares have been authorized to be condemned or used for the municipal center.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, they are the four squares generally between Third and Sixth Streets and north of Pennsylvania Avenue to Judiciary Square.

Mr. STAFFORD. As related in the public press during the last few weeks?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; that is substantially correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. Including the Ford Building?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Ford Building will be a rather expensive building to condemn, will it not? It is the only modern building on the whole site.

Mr. SIMMONS. And it is fortunate for the District of Columbia that the rest of the buildings are not modern.

Mr. STAFFORD. What estimate has been made as to what the total cost will be for condemning these four squares, including reservation 10?

Mr. SIMMONS. Approximately $6,000,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of which the United States pays how much?

Mr. SIMMONS. All the purchase price is to be paid out of the surplus now in the United States Treasury belonging to the District of Columbia. No part of it comes direct from the Federal Treasury.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Referring to the provision for architectural and other professional services, I presume that would mean engineering as well as architectural?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the language to authorize the hiring of special services.

Mr. BYRNS. May I ask the gentleman from Indiana what is the effect of the amendment?

Mr. WOOD. It is the same amendment that has been ordinarily attached to appropriations of this character to be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and the United States—

In the manner prescribed for defraying the expenses of the District of Columbia by the District of Columbia appropriation acts for the fiscal years during which payments hereunder may be made.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is the language that is carried in the deficiency appropriation acts, whereas the resolution as originally drawn carried the language used in the annual appropriation bill.

Mr. BYRNS. And the Government contributing a lump sum, of course it comes out of the District revenues.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Is this amount sufficient to pay for the whole of the civic center?

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, no; it will pay only about half.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is there any provision in the existing law which would require that the plans for new buildings on the opposite side of Pennsylvania Avenue—that is, on the side opposite to where the new Government buildings are going to be constructed—be submitted to anyone for approval? In other words, we are improving all of one side of Pennsylvania Avenue from the Treasury down to the Capitol and leaving the other side, with the exception of this municipal center, entirely open. In all likelihood the value of that property will greatly enhance, and those buildings there will eventually have to come down. Is there any requirement in the zoning or other laws of the District of Columbia that would compel a proper architectural style to be adopted for any new buildings that may be erected upon that side of Pennsylvania Avenue?

Mr. WOOD. The existing law requires the plans for any Government building to be submitted to the Fine Arts Commission. That should also be extended to private buildings.

Mr. CRAMTON. The existing law is one which ought to be extended in order to properly protect the situation.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Exactly. If we are going to have one style of architecture on one side of Pennsylvania Avenue, and a hodgepodge of buildings on the other, it would simply destroy the beauty of the whole scheme.

Mr. STAFFORD. We are proposing to condemn everything from Third to Sixth Streets on the northerly side of Pennsylvania Avenue. Has any provision been made for the condemnation of property from Second to Third, which faces the Capitol Grounds?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is under another bill.

Mr. WOOD. There is provision being made for that purpose. It is not the intention of the Government to permit any other than Government buildings in any portion of that section down to the Peace Monument.

Mr. STAFFORD. There has been some special legislation carrying out that proposal?

Mr. WOOD. An act was passed at the last session providing for an extension of the Capitol Grounds and to include that area.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution, as amended.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

REHABILITATING FARM LANDS IN FLOODED AREAS

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3548) to continue, during the fiscal year 1930, Federal aid in rehabilitating farm lands in the areas devastated by floods in 1927, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any unexpended balance of the appropriation to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the act entitled "An act for the purpose of rehabilitating farm lands in the flood areas," approved January 26, 1928, contained in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes," approved May 16, 1928, is hereby reappropriated, and shall remain available for the same purposes during the fiscal year 1930.

Mr. WOOD. The purpose of this measure is to reappropriate a balance of $60,000 of an appropriation made in 1928 of $500,000 for extension work by the Agricultural Department. There is $60,000 of that still remaining. Within the last few weeks there has been another great flood down there in Mississippi and Louisiana, which destroyed all the crops that were planted and growing, and in order that there may be something saved out of the wreck it is recommended by the President and also by the Budget Bureau that this appropriation be made.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Is that the resolution recently passed?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

JUDGMENTS AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 3663.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 3663. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 3663

A bill making appropriations for the payment of certain judgments rendered against the Government by various United States courts

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of the following judgments, namely:

JUDGMENTS, UNITED STATES COURTS

For payment of the final judgments and decrees, including costs of suits, which have been rendered under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States," as amended by the Judicial Code, approved March 3, 1911, certified to the Seventy-first Congress in House Document No. 25, under the following departments and establishments, namely: United States Shipping Board, $17,836.98; Navy Department, $9,433.94; Treasury Department, $6,348.15; War Department, $3,149; in all, $36,768.07; together with such additional sum as may be necessary to pay interest on the respective judgments at the rate of 4 per cent from the date thereof until the time this appropriation is made.

For payment of the judgments, including costs of suits, rendered against the Government by United States district courts in special cases and under the provisions of certain special acts and certified to the Seventy-first Congress in House Document No. 26, under the following departments and establishments, namely: United States Shipping Board, $6,089.54; Navy Department, $29,233.03; War Department, $113,219.85; in all, $148,542.42, together with such additional sum as may be necessary to pay interest on certain of the judgments as and where specified in such judgments.

For the payment of judgments, including costs of suits, rendered against the Government of the United States by United States district courts under the provisions of an act entitled "An act authorizing suits against the United States in admiralty for damage caused by and salvage services rendered to public vessels belonging to the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1925 (U. S. C. p. 1529, secs. 781–789), certified to the Seventy-first Congress in House Document No. 28, under the following departments, namely: Department of Commerce, $6,844.73; Navy Department, $1,498.32; in all, $8,343.05, together with such additional sum as may be necessary to pay interest as and where specified in such judgments.

None of the judgments contained under this caption shall be paid until the right of appeal shall have expired, except such as have become final and conclusive against the United States by failure of the parties to appeal or otherwise.

Payment of interest wherever provided for judgments contained in this act shall not in any case continue for more than 30 days after the date of approval of the act.

JUDGMENTS, COURT OF CLAIMS

For payment of the judgments rendered by the Court of Claims and reported to the Seventy-first Congress in House Document No. 27, under the following departments and establishments, namely: United States Railroad Administration, $60,428.39; Navy Department, $877,449.65; War Department, $244,784.92; in all, $1,182,662.96, together with such additional sum as may be necessary to pay interest on certain of the judgments at the legal rate per annum as and where specified in said judgments.

None of the judgments contained under this caption which have not been affirmed by the Supreme Court or otherwise became final and conclusive against the United States shall be paid until the expiration of the time within which application may be made for a writ of certiorari under subdivision (b), section 3, of the act entitled "An act to amend the Judicial Code, and to further define the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of appeals and of the Supreme Court, and for other purposes," approved February 13, 1925 (U. S. C. p. 900, sec. 288).

Mr. WOOD. I will say to the House that all these judgments have been properly certified and the Budget estimate approved by the President. It will save 4 per cent. We desire to save that 4 per cent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

POST-OFFICE BUILDING AT CORINTH, MISS.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House Joint Resolution 88.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of House Joint Resolution 88, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Joint Resolution 88

Joint resolution making an additional appropriation for the extension to the post-office building at Corinth, Miss.

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $876.04 for the purpose of providing granite entrance steps for the extension to the post-office building at Corinth, Miss., authorized by the first deficiency act, fiscal year 1928, approved December 22, 1927. Such amount shall be in addition to all other amounts heretofore appropriated for the extension of such post-office building.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the House that this measure is for the purpose of providing the money necessary to complete the post office at Corinth, Miss. The post office there burned down some time ago, and the Supervising Architect, in providing the plans for rebuilding, seems to have omitted the building of granite steps to one of the approaches. I called the attention of Mr. Wetmore to it, and he said the bill ought to pass.

Mr. GARNER. Is this a Budget item?

Mr. WOOD. I do not know whether there was a Budget recommendation concerning it or not. I will ask the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] if there was a Budget estimate.

Mr. RANKIN. I do not know as to that.

Mr. GARNER. The only point about that is that Congress may be charged with appropriating more money than the Budget estimated.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the House joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PULASKI SESQUICENTENNIAL COMMISSION

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House Joint Resolution 91.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of House Joint Resolution 91. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Joint Resolution 91

Joint resolution to provide for the payment of certain expenses of the United States Pulaski Sesquicentennial Commission

Resolved, etc., That for expenses of the United States Pulaski Sesquicentennial Commission created by Public Resolution No. 86, Seventieth Congress, approved February 16, 1929, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,500, to remain available until June 30, 1930, for the payment of such expenditures as may be necessary and incident to the duties of the commission, including stationery and office supplies, compensation of a secretary, traveling expenses, and for subsistence expenses of the members of the commission and the secretary when traveling on official business at such rate per diem as the commission may determine.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, this is an appropriation for defraying the expenses of the commission appointed by the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate to participate in the Pulaski sesquicentennial celebration of the birth of Pulaski.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Where is the celebration to take place?

Mr. WOOD. At Savannah, Ga.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

INTERNATIONAL RED CROSS CONFERENCE AT GENEVA, 1929

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consideration of House Joint Resolution 86.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Joint Resolution 86

Joint resolution making an appropriation for the International Red Cross and prisoners of war conference at Geneva, Switzerland, in 1929

Resolved, etc., That the sum of $34,000 is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to remain available until June 30, 1930, for the expenses of participation by the United States in the international conference for the revision of the Geneva convention of July 6, 1906, for the amelioration of the condition of the wounded in the armies in the field; and for the study of the revision of the code for prisoners of war adopted at The Hague in 1907, to be held at Geneva, Switzerland, in July, 1929, including travel and subsistence or per diem in lieu of subsistence (notwithstanding the provisions of any other act), compensation of employees, stenographic and other services by contract if deemed necessary, rent of office, purchase of necessary books and documents, printing and binding, official cards, and such other expenses as may be authorized by the Secretary of State.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, the purpose of this appropriation is to permit the United States Government to participate in a convention to be held at Geneva to revise the treaty or prepare a new treaty for the benefit of the Red Cross in its care for the wounded and prisoners of war. They have not had a convention since 1896.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Who selects the delegates to conventions of this kind?

Mr. WOOD. I asked Mr. Carr that question, and he said the delegates were selected, one from the War Department, and one from the State Department, and one from among our ministers in Europe.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE ST. CLAIR RIVER, MICH.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 3600. It is an amendment to a bridge bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 of an act entitled "An act authorizing Maynard D. Smith, his heirs, successors, and assigns to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the St. Clair River at or near Port Huron, Mich.," approved March 2, 1929, being Public Act No. 923 of the Seventieth Congress, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. The said Maynard D. Smith, his heirs, successors, and assigns, from time to time may issue bonds, notes, debentures, or other evidences of indebtedness and preferred stock in such principal amount or amounts, and may sell or otherwise dispose of the same at such price or prices as shall have been approved by the Michigan Public Utilities Commission in order to provide funds for the acquisition of real estate and other property or any interest therein needed for the construction of such bridge and its approaches, to provide funds for the construction of such bridge and its approaches, interest during construction, and the costs of financing; and may secure payment of all or any part of said bonds, notes, debentures, or other evidences of indebtedness by mortgage or other lien upon all or any part of said real estate and other property, including said bridge and its approaches and the franchises and rights to operate and maintain the same, together with the tolls therefrom. All or any of said bonds, notes, debentures, or other evidences of indebtedness and shares of preferred stock shall be subject to redemption at any time or from time to time upon such notice and with such premium, if any, as may be provided therein. Not less than two-thirds of all encumbrances or securities other than preferred stock issued against said bridge shall be first-mortgage bonds, and not more than one-third may be debentures. None of said bonds issued against said bridge shall bear interest at a fixed rate in excess of 6½ per cent per annum on the principal amount thereof. None of said debentures issued against said bridge shall bear interest at a fixed rate in excess of 7 per cent per annum on the principal amount thereof. Any preferred stock issued shall be at par, shall represent value, and may be entitled to accumulative dividends at not to exceed 7 per cent per annum."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does this refer to the international bridge for the construction of which we gave permission some time ago?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does the gentleman's proposed amendment in any way change the good features of his original bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. No. I will say to the gentleman that this is an important bridge between Port Huron, Mich., and Sarnia, Ontario. The bridge is to cost about $5,000,000, and, being an international bridge, it presented certain difficulties that would not exist otherwise. The recapture clause in this bill was particularly favorable to the public in this, that 80 per cent of the net earnings of the tolls go to retire the obligations, and when the obligations are retired the bridge becomes the property of the State of Michigan and the Dominion of Canada. That is a particularly favorable provision, but since we did provide for the taking over of it upon the payment of the obligations, instead of making the cost of the bridge the test for the measure of damages in condemnation it is necessary to give some attention to the securities and see that they are not inflated. The bill as it passed provided that the total securities should not exceed the actual cost of the bridge as determined by the Secretary of War, but his determination is after the bridge is built and the attorneys for the bankers who have agreed to finance the undertaking say they can not sell bonds the validity of which will remain in question until a year or two after the money is spent and also because conditions in the bond market are not as favorable to-day as they were a year ago.

This amendment provides this: That no securities can be issued unless the amount of such securities and the price at which they are sold are approved by the Michigan Public Utilities Commission. While we can not order that commission, a State agency, to act, they have been consulted and they have agreed to accept the responsibility. That is what the amendment does, and if I may make this further statement, I will say that the necessary legislation has been passed by Canada, the plans have been approved by the War Department and the Canadian authorities; they have an estimate from McClintock & Marshall as to the cost of the bridge, and it is just awaiting financing and they can not go ahead in that without this legislation. It will save a year in the construction of the bridge if the House will permit this action now.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I want to say right now—and I am glad the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON], a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and the gentleman from Texas are here—that this bill is a model bill for international bridges, and that in the next session of Congress bills providing for the erection of international bridges will have to meet the requirements of this model bill or there will be objection.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman from New York must remember that the gentleman from Michigan worked out the provisions of this bill in conference with all the interested parties, and it is the result of an agreement. However, Congress can not impose agreements on people unless they are willing to accept them.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Well, unless these agreements come up to the requirements contained in this bill, there are going to be objections; and the gentleman from Illinois knowing that, will see that hereafter such bills come in with proper agreements to protect the public.

Mr. DENISON. Of course, the gentleman from New York always has the same privilege that all Members have of objecting to any bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I know that; but the gentleman will be surprised to know how many Members are now taking that attitude.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman permit this further statement?

A similar bill which was introduced in the Senate was referred to the departments, and the Departments of War and Agriculture have approved the bill.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. The gentleman mentioned the Michigan Public Utilities Commission. Does the Michigan Public Utilities Commission seem to function generally in the interest of the public or in the interest of the large utilities?

Mr. CRAMTON. We have a very good commission in the State of Michigan, and I have confidence that their action will fully protect the public.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield.

Mr. LEAVITT. I would like a little more time to consider this matter and become more fully informed, and for the time being I object.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield to a suggestion? I want to say to the gentleman from New York——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I expected it.

Mr. DEMPSEY (continuing). That this is not the original or the pioneer bill with these good provisions. The bill providing for the Peace Bridge at Buffalo contained conditions of the same nature and protected the public just as fully as this bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Anything that my colleague the gentleman from New York would sponsor, of course, would be in good shape, well drawn, and the public fully protected.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand that objection has been made?

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman from Montana will withhold his objection——

Mr. LEAVITT. I withhold it, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CRAMTON. I want to emphasize for the consideration of the gentleman the importance of this bridge. It will be the connecting link in the northernmost transcontinental highway of the country for traffic coming from the great Northwest, crossing Lake Michigan from Milwaukee to Grand Haven and across through Port Huron and Sarnia and on to Niagara Falls and the St. Lawrence and New England. While it is being built as a toll bridge, through the recapture clause that has been referred to, 80 per cent of the net earnings from tolls goes to retire the obligations. In most of these bridge propositions the bankers require, independent of any recapture clause, that 65 per cent of the net earnings go into a sinking fund to retire obligations, but in this case 80 per cent, or $4 out of every $5 of net revenue, goes to retire the obligations, and when they are retired the bridge is turned over to the State and to the Dominion and becomes a free bridge with no tolls except, perhaps, a nominal amount to take care of the operating cost or something of that kind, but probably an entirely free bridge. It is a matter of very great importance, and I can not conceive of any interest the gentleman might have that would be adverse to the matters I have suggested.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I would suggest to the gentleman that we have several bridges on the Niagara frontier, and they are absolutely invaluable and are of increasing usefulness from day to day, and I think the gentleman's bridge will be invaluable to all that part of Michigan.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield, under the reservation of objection, to explain succinctly just wherein the amendment differs from the original law? As I understand, this is merely an amendment of a minor particular.

Mr. CRAMTON. It is entirely a minor proposition. The fundamental proposition of the recapture clause is not touched. The present law provides that the amount of securities issued must not exceed the cost of the bridge as determined by the Secretary of War under section 8, and this determination by the Secretary of War under section 8 is the determination that he arrives at as to all toll bridges.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is merely an estimate?

Mr. CRAMTON. That finding is not arrived at until after the bridge is built—within three years after its completion—and this provides for immediate action.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, my reservation of objection is due to the fact that I have not understood that matters of this kind could be brought before the House without the action of some committee. I have a matter of my own that is just as vital to a reclamation project in my State as this is to the State of Michigan and I would like to know how I am going to get that matter up. It is merely a question of an amendment to an appropriation bill, but it is just as vital, and I would like to know how it is going to be possible for me to get the matter before the House. Other Members, I think, are interested in the same sort of thing, and I want to know whether we are going to make exceptions in cases of this kind or whether the same opportunity is going to be given to all of us.

Mr. CRAMTON. I may say I have been glad to cooperate with the gentleman from Montana on a great many matters that affected his State even in a more important way than the Glasgow project. This bill has been favorably passed upon by two departments interested. If the Glasgow matter is passed upon favorably by the Interior Department, I have no objection to it. I can not speak for anybody else but myself. I will say that the House has permitted several matters to come up where there was an emergency existing even when there was no committee report.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, with that explanation I withdraw my objection.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from Michigan if he has consulted with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON], the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. PARKS], and the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURTNESS], the subcommittee that would have jurisdiction of bridge bills, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. They are better informed on the subject, and I would like to have the RECORD show if he has consulted them.

Mr. CRAMTON. I have consulted the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON], who is in sympathy with it, and have supposed that he consulted with other Members. He has known of it for several days.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, while our committee has not been organized those who are members of the subcommittee I have consulted with, and I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan is proper, and in view of the conditions that exist it is more or less of an emergency. I think if our committee was organized and the subcommittee was functioning they would readily recommend the passage of this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Connecticut how long he intends to proceed to-day. The membership has largely left the House. We understood that no more business would be transacted under the general agreement and understanding at the beginning of the session.

Mr. TILSON. We have been going on by unanimous consent.

Mr. GARNER. I know that, but many Members have left the House and they might want to object. I do not want to take the responsibility of objecting to a bill that I know nothing about.

Mr. CRAMTON rose.

Mr. GARNER. Oh, the gentleman's bill has already passed.

Mr. CRAMTON. I want to call up another one that has already been discussed.

Mr. TILSON. We wish to get these unanimous-consent matters cleared out of the way.

Mr. GARNER. How many more are there?

Mr. TILSON. I believe there is only one more.

Mr. GARNER. All right, go ahead.

CONSOLIDATED SCHOOL—TURTLE MOUNTAIN INDIAN RESERVATION

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House Joint Resolution 93.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the House joint resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Joint Resolution 93

Amending an appropriation for a consolidated school at Belcourt, within the Turtle Mountain Indian Reservation, N. Dak.

Resolved, etc., That the provision in the second deficiency act approved March 4, 1929 (Public, No. 1035), making an appropriation for a consolidated day school at Belcourt within the Turtle Mountain Indian Reservation, N. Dak., is amended to read as follows:

"Turtle Mountain Reservation, N. Dak.: For construction and equipment, including not to exceed $5,000 for motor busses, of a consolidated day school at Belcourt, within the Turle Mountain Indian Reservation, N. Dak., fiscal years 1929 and 1930, $125,000: Provided, That such school shall be open for attendance by white children and by restricted or nonrestricted Indian children resident within said reservation if and when the State tuition fund and the county tuition fund, which would otherwise be paid to school districts in said reservation, if functioning, and the proceeds of the usual school levy in the said school districts, shall be paid to the United States to be used to supplement Government appropriations for the maintenance and operation of said consolidated school and for the payment of tuition of any white and Indian children, restricted or unrestricted, residing within said reservation in any high school approved by the superintendent of the Turtle Mountain Agency."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I think I ought to make this explanation. This is a matter in which the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. HALL] is much interested. I visited the reservation last year. An appropriation was carried of $125,000 for the building of a consolidated school to serve two townships where the population is almost entirely Indians. A provision for State cooperation financially has resulted in tying up the appropriation because of a ruling of the Comptroller General, and the language here is an attempt to cut the knot and permit construction to go on. I can make a statement as to the details of it, but I do not want to delay the House.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman will yield, if I understand the proposition this would come from the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Has the gentleman discussed it with the members of the subcommittee?

Mr. CRAMTON. It was brought to their attention and has their approval as well as of the department. As I said, the population is chiefly children of restricted Indians. There are also some unrestricted Indians, a few of the Indians are taxed and some white pay taxes. This will be a school that will serve two townships constituting the Turtle Mountain Indian Reservation. There is about $5,000 of State and county tuition money paid out on a per capita basis. About $3,000 school tax is raised by tax on some property in the reservation not owned by restricted Indians. This amendment provides that the State and county tuition and the school tax shall be turned over to the Government to be used in the operation of the school, and in return the Government admits to the school the children of whites and of unrestricted Indians, and if any children of whites or Indians on the reservation are to go to a high school off the reservation the tuition can be paid out of this State and county tuition and school tax.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the Government here pursuing any new policy or establishing a new policy in regard to the combination schools?

Mr. CRAMTON. This is in harmony with our general policy. I can not say that exactly this thing has been done at any other place, but it is in harmony with the policy that we are following. For instance, in Oklahoma we are paying tuition to enable Indian children to attend white schools and——

Mr. STAFFORD. That has been the established policy for a long time. Here we are attempting to establish a school at the Federal Government's expense for the education of white children domiciled in North Dakota.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am not sure whether you would find exactly these conditions elsewhere. The situation with respect to the Turtle Mountain Indian Reservation, consisting of two townships, is that the Government, through an excess of zeal for the welfare of the Indians, a number of years ago expedited the removal of restrictions from a number of those Indians. They were given the title to their lands, and the restrictions against alienation being removed, they, of course, at once disposed of their lands and they are there now in poverty.

Mr. STAFFORD. Here the Government is establishing a policy for the first time of giving education to citizens of a State.

Mr. CRAMTON. Not the first time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where are there any other instances?

Mr. CRAMTON. All of these Indians are citizens.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, I mean white children.

Mr. CRAMTON. The number of white children here is very limited. The amount that will come to us from the State tax and the State and county tuition will exceed the cost of the education of these white children.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think it is a questionable policy to launch the idea of the National Government establishing high-school facilities for the education of the people of a State.

Mr. CRAMTON. The only money under this that can be used to pay the school tuition of the white children at the high school is not from the Federal Treasury but is this money that comes in from local school tax or the State and county tuition.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not like the provisions of the bill. I think we should not consider this sort of bill without a report. We know nothing about the facts in advance. They are brought in here and thrown into the well without consideration in a formal way by a committee or a subcommittee. I shall not interpose any objection to it, but it is not the proper way to legislate.

Mr. DE PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I notice the language in the bill is "white children." Are there any black children in that territory there?

Mr. CRAMTON. I think not. I have not heard of any.

Mr. TILSON. It simply means non-Indians.

Mr. DE PRIEST. But that is not what it says.

Mr. CRAMTON. I never heard of any. I was up there and I am sure there are none. There are some that get pretty dark.

Mr. DE PRIEST. I know, and there are a lot of dark ones all around here, but because of the way in which the bill reads I have reserved the right to object, and I do object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. DE PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman to withhold his objection for a moment. Let me make this suggestion: I doubt whether there is anyone in this House, including the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DE PRIEST], who has taken a more active interest in education for the Negro race than I have through my handling of appropriations for Howard University for the last nine years. Year by year I have battled for that appropriation. The gentleman can get confirmation of that very easily. There is no discrimination here. This is an attempt to provide proper education for every child in that township. We do not say anything about the Chinese, because there are no Chinese there, and we do not say anything about negroes, because there are none there.

Mr. DE PRIEST. To the best of the gentleman's knowledge there are none there.

Mr. CRAMTON. But I have been there, and I have made an investigation of the situation there. I went there for that purpose. If the gentleman finds that there are any negroes there, they will be taken care of.

Mr. DE PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, that is assurance enough for me. I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no obection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ADDRESS BY HON. WILLIAM E. HULL, OF ILLINOIS

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein a speech delivered by the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL, at Omaha, Nebr., on the 3d of June, on the subject of waterways.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include a speech delivered by Hon. WILLIAM E. HULL, of Illinois, at Omaha, Nebr., on June 3, 1929, on the subject of waterways.

The speech is as follows:

DEVELOPMENT OF INLAND WATERWAYS

Herbert Hoover is the confident hope of the inland waterways of the Nation. We, its advocates, must work with the President of the United States and secure from Congress appropriations large enough to complete all of the projects within a 4-year period.

The Illinois, Mississippi, and Missouri River system, including their tributaries, comprises 9,000 miles of channel that will carry our products to the sea, leading from Pittsburgh in the East, Chicago and the Great Lakes in the North, St. Paul and Minneapolis in the Northwest, Sioux City, Omaha, and Kansas City, in the West, the intracoastal canal and the Warrior River in the South, making a network of rivers formulating the greatest inland waterway transportation system in the world, is now an authorized project and its completion will be a great boon to the western country for all time.

The necessity of inland waterway transportation has been brought about by the building of the Panama Canal, which has carried great benefits to our people. But we can not ignore the fact that it has also contributed to distort the competitive relationship of the Mid West and our seaboard industry. The fact that it has drawn the east and west seaboards together by decreasing its transportation costs has practically ruined the central west business to the Atlantic and Pacific coasts.

By using this canal the ships can carry the products from coast to coast on an average of one-fourth the cost by rail from the Mid West to either coast. Thus, it can easily be seen that it is impossible to compete against such cheap transportation, and therefore this great inland waterway, which has been advocated for years, has now reached a point where the people of the Central West can be assured that in the near future they will have a transportation system by water that will equalize freight rates with the East and the West.

Without this transportation the Mid West must suffer by certain lines of business migrating to the seaboard. It tends to establish the manufacturer nearer the seaboard and farther from the heart of agriculture, to the mutual disadvantage of both. It destroys the Mid West wholesale distribution, as many merchants and manufacturers in the interior will testify. Its serious effect on agriculture and upon business would make it seem reasonable that it is worthy of our best efforts to remedy, and the remedy is cheaper transportation in bulk products of agriculture and raw materials.

Our railroads have reached the highest efficiency in their history but they must maintain this efficiency. With the higher cost of labor and materials they can not reduce their freight rates. The Panama Canal can not be closed; neither can we raise the Atlantic Ocean and other sea freight rates. The standard of living in the rest of the world is so inferior to our own and as they have not increased their wage scale the cost of operating foreign overseas shipping has not been raised to a point that will equalize the expense in this country.

Under such conditions we must turn to our natural waterways which providence has blessed us with. In order to accomplish this we must deepen our rivers to permit modern barge transportation, deepen the outlet to the Great Lakes to permit ocean-going shipping and connect them altogether into a definite transportation system. This would give us 12,000 miles of connected inland water transportation, reaching from Duluth in the North to New York in the East, from Chicago to New Orleans, from Pittsburgh to Sioux City, from New Orleans to Houston, Tex., thus making a network of inland waterways larger than any in the world.

Can you visualize a shipment direct from London to Chicago by water and then from Chicago to St. Paul on the north to Peoria and St. Louis in the Middle West; to Pittsburgh in the East; to Sioux City, Omaha, and Kansas City in the West; and thence on to New Orleans to the Gulf of Mexico and across the great State of Texas to Houston and Corpus Christi? Such a water transportation would be of great benefit to the coast cities as well as to the inland part of our Nation.

I can see the oil and fruits coming from California to Chicago, the great textile mills and the eastern manufacturers shipping their products by way of New Orleans to Chicago, St. Louis, Kansas City, Omaha, and Sioux City, all by water and then to be distributed by the railroads over the whole northwestern and western country.

Is there anyone in the United States who would begrudge the Government expending funds out of the Treasury of the country in order to make such a system of waterways? It will be the greatest help for agricultural relief that any Congress will ever pass; it will build a national highway of water transportation, thus giving opportunities of building elevators and warehouses along this great system, which will store the products of the farm for a future delivery and, in my judgment, will give greater farm relief than all of the legislation that Congress will pass.

By completing this great inland waterway within four years, you will save the farmers of this Nation millions of dollars in freight. Every bushel of corn, wheat, or grain exported from this part of the country will receive the benefit of the freight rate to the foreign nations, and, therefore, it is my intention to do everything that I can to bring about an early completion of this great inland waterway system.

It is evident that the farmer will ship his produce by water wherever he can because he realizes that he can save 10 cents per hundred on every bushel of grain that he exports from this Nation through this water transportation. We will never come into a full realization of the services of this great inland waterway until we have completed every section of the system, which will give us full value for cheaper transportation costs. Therefore it is up to those of us who live in the Central West and the West to stand shoulder to shoulder in a solid phalanx until we have convinced those in power at Washington the necessity of a full completion of the channels of the Missouri River, the Mississippi River, the Illinois River, and the intracoastal canal.

By hard and persuasive work your Congressmen of the West, aided by one of the greatest advocates of waterways in the world, Cleveland Newton, of St. Louis, have brought about 60 per cent of the completion of this great system. There is left to be completed yet the following:

Mississippi River, from St. Paul to the mouth of the Illinois River, Grafton, 6-foot channel	$2,500,000
Mississippi River, from the mouth of the Illinois River to St. Louis, 9-foot channel	1,500,000
Illinois River, from Utica to Grafton, 9-foot channel	2,250,000
Intracoastal canal, from New Orleans to Corpus Christi, Tex., 9-foot channel	16,000,000
Missouri River, from St. Louis to Kansas City, 6-foot channel	17,500,000
Missouri River, from Kansas City to Sioux City, Iowa, 6-foot channel	54,000,000
Total	93,750,000

After this is done then the boats can travel over the entire system.

DENISON LAW

Another great advantage that we have accrued in the last two years is the passage of legislation known as the Denison law.

This has forced the railroads to make a joint through rate with the inland waterway system, either voluntarily or they will be directed by the Interstate Commerce Commission to do so. This will make a rail-water-rail rate, giving everybody in the hinterland the same opportunity to use the waterway system as those who live upon the waterway itself.

In order that you may thoroughly understand what I mean, if a shipper was to ship a carload of wheat from Butte, Mont., to Columbia, S. C., the freight rate would be the rail rate to St. Paul, the water rate to Memphis, and the rail rate to Columbia, S. C., thus giving this shipper the privilege of securing the water rate from St. Paul to Memphis.

So, you can understand now that everybody is to participate in the reduction of water freight rates.

In addition to this I quote from the Denison bill, as follows:

"When the improvement of any tributary or connecting waterway of the Mississippi River, not including the Ohio River, shall have been completed or advanced to the point where within two years thereafter there will have been substantially completed a sufficient and dependable channel for the safe operation of suitable barges and towboats thereon; and when the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army shall certify that fact to the Secretary of War, the Secretary of War shall thereupon cause a survey of such tributary or connecting waterway to be made for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of traffic, the terminal facilities, and the through routes and joint tariff arrangements with connecting carriers, that are or will, within such years, probably be available on such tributary or connecting waterway. As soon thereafter as such survey shall have been completed and a sufficient and dependable channel for the safe operation of suitable barges and towboats shall have been substantially completed, the Secretary of War may, if he finds from such survey that water transportation can, in the public interest, be successfully operated on such tributary or connecting waterway, extend the services of the Inland Waterways Corporation thereon as soon as the corporation shall have suitable facilities available therefor."

So it is evident that before long the Government barge line will be operating on the Illinois and Missouri Rivers, as well as upon the Mississippi River.

MISSION OF INLAND WATERWAYS CORPORATION

The mission of the corporation is defined in the policy of Congress "to promote, encourage, and develop water transportation and to foster and preserve in full vigor both rail and water transportation," and its existence is due to the will of Congress to carry on the operations of the Government-owned inland, canal, and coastwise system to the point where the system can be transferred to private operation to the best advantage of the Government.

WATER COMPETITION—RELIEF FROM HIGH RAIL RATES

For 23 years the standard rail and lake routes from New York to Chicago were on a scale of 54 cents per 100 pounds. After the acquisition by the railroads of the lake routes the rates gradually increased. In 1915 they were 62 cents per 100 pounds, and in 1925, $1.42 per 100, an increase of 275 per cent.

In 1915 the Interstate Commerce Commission denied to the railroads permission to continue the ownership by parallel rail lines of the common carriers on the Great Lakes and the lake lines discontinued operation.

The history of the first-class rate by rail from St. Louis to New Orleans shows substantially the same depression and subsequent elevation. Between 1885 and 1887 the competition of the steamboats forced the first-class rate from $1 to 75 cents. By 1887 it had risen to 90 cents, where it remained stationary until the war and the advent of the Railroad Administration. Since then by successive advances this all-rail rate rose, until in 1925 it was $1.73½.

With the close of the war came the development of water traffic through the Panama Canal from which railroad-owned ships are barred by law. To-day the interest of the Mississippi Valley, including the valleys of the Missouri, the Illinois and other tributaries, is focused on the fact of a rail rate on first-class traffic to the Pacific coast approximately twice the rate from New York by sea.

The revival of transportation on the great Mississippi system of natural waterways offers the only possible relief. With these channels opened up, industry on these rivers will be able to ship to and from the east and west coasts on rates comparable with rates enjoyed by coastwise industry. In other words, the advantages of the Panama Canal will be no longer denied to the central portion of the United States.

VARIOUS COMMODITIES MOVING OVER THE LINES OF THE CORPORATION

The corporation distributes freight between all of the States of the Union except five, and has arranged to exchange traffic with nearly 200 railroads and many other land carriers and numerous purely water carriers. Its tows move now from the Twin Cities on the north and New Orleans on the south, from thence to Mobile and thence along the Warrior system of canals to Birmingport, Ala., from which point it connects with Birmingham by a short railroad which it owns.

In it the country now has the means of insuring on the Mississippi and Warrior systems proper at least that kind of water transportation that distributes its benefits to the country at large. Under the law, through the whole Mississippi system, including the Missouri, the Ohio, and the Illinois Rivers, thus connecting the Great Lakes with the Gulf of Mexico. It is true that this system has been working at a great loss to the Government, but that comes from the fact that there has been no absolute connection with all of the different tributaries. My judgment is that whenever they are all connected, it will work to a great profit to the Government of the United States.

I might quote that in 1920 they moved 360,719 tons; in 1921, 672,111 tons; in 1922, 860,013 tons; in 1923, 979,722 tons; in 1924, 1,071,848 tons; in 1925, 1,142,219 tons; and in 1926, 1,341,578 tons, at an average saving to the shipper or the consignee on the Mississippi in 1926 of $1.75 a ton and on the Warrior in the same year of $0.75 per ton. The average saving on the whole system in 1926 was a little more than $1.50 a ton. Of this, grain moving for export in 1926 reached the junction markets alluded to above at a cost of between 3 and 6½ cents per bushel below what it would have paid if the barge-line service had not been available. This grain constituted but a small portion of the exportable surplus of the interior communities which produced it. The Government barge line carried all that its equipment permitted. The day is almost here when the carrier is compelled almost daily to turn away freight offerings. If equipment was available on this stretch of the river to meet all demands, it is probable that the whole exportable surplus of wheat from those communities that raised the portion that moved in the Government barges would reach the seaboard, and the saving on the whole would unquestionably reflect itself by raising the price paid the farmer, if, indeed, this benefit has not already accrued to him.

So much sugar now moves over this line that the price of this commodity in the interior is the price at New Orleans plus the barge-line rate north, so that the hinterlands of Helena, Memphis, St. Louis, and Chicago now have the cheaper transportation reflected in the price they pay for this commodity. When the season of navigation opens on the upper Mississippi the people behind the cities of the upper river will derive this benefit. Arrangements are now being worked out whereby this commodity will move through Cairo via the Ohio River carriers up the river. This will carry this benefit to the people served by the Ohio River.

And now, my friends, what we need is to complete the channels on the Missouri and the Illinois Rivers and give all of the people in the great Mississippi Valley the same opportunity as is given those on the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers at the present time.

During the Seventieth Congress we were able to pass in the Denison bill an appropriation of $10,000,000 to build additional barges and towboats. Three million of this has been set aside for the Missouri River and three million for the Illinois River.

So the equipment is now provided for, and those who live upon the Missouri and Illinois Rivers must begin at once to arrange for terminals. Every city of any size, from the mouth of the Missouri River to Sioux City, should begin now to arrange to pass bond issues in order to facilitate the building of terminals. No terminal can be built for less than $300,000, and some of them as high as $500,000. It is not an easy job to raise this amount of money quickly, and so

I would advise all of you along the great Missouri or the Mississippi or the Illinois to immediately begin to make your arrangements for the terminals.

If the barge line was now extended to Chicago, I could produce tables here showing great savings to all of this section of the country. You can realize the necessity, first of all, of making the connection with the Great Lakes and the Gulf. That will be the main trunk line; the Missouri, the upper Mississippi, the Ohio Rivers, and the intracoastal canal will be the tributaries. And so we must all work hand in hand to complete the Illinois part of this project at the earliest possible moment.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE MISSOURI RIVER

We are here to discuss the improvement of the river that carries more water in it than any of the other rivers, and in all probability when completed will be one of the best tributaries of the system.

There is no greater agricultural area in the world than that drained by the Missouri River. There is no soil more fertile and no section capable of sustaining a more healthful, thrifty, or prosperous population than this great interior district, and yet the Missouri Valley, productive as it is, has been held back in its development by the high freight rates which have prevented the equitable transportation of its commodities to the markets in other sections of the United States and to outside markets of the world. The development of industry in the midst of agriculture would contribute immeasurably to the development of this great agricultural section, but high railroad rates, which prevent manufacturers in this area competing with manufacturers located where cheap water rates are available, either along the Great Lakes, the seashore, or the Gulf, have deterred factories from locating in this district.

As an evidence of what cheap water transportation will do we have only to point to the development of industries and factories and the growth of cities as a result of such development around the Great Lakes and along the seashore, while the cities along the Missouri River have struggled with little progress because of the inability of factories and industries to operate successfully in an area where freight rates are so high. The factories can move to the seashore, to the Lakes, or along the banks of already developed rivers, but the only way to bring relief to the great agricultural area of the Missouri Valley is to develop the highways which nature provided, making the Missouri River navigable first with a 6 and then with a 9-foot channel, and when cheap water rates reach the interior of agriculture the factories and industries will follow, and this great section will begin to prosper and grow as it has never done in its history.

Congress has adopted a 6-foot project from the mouth of the Missouri River to Sioux City. Some of the money has been appropriated and the War Department has allotted the money and the improvement of the project from Kansas City to the mouth is going forward with unprecedented speed. The Chief of Engineers advises that a 6-foot channel will be available some time in 1930. An abundance of money has been appropriated and is now available for river and harbor work and a substantial amount should be allocated, and work should be carried on with determination and vigor toward the completion of a 6-foot channel from Kansas City to Sioux City on the Missouri River. The faster this work is carried to completion the quicker cheap water rates will be available and the sooner the farm problem of the Missouri River Valley will be solved.

We have on the Ohio River a 9-foot project almost completed from Pittsburgh to Cairo. We have upon the Mississippi River a 9-foot project nearing completion from St. Louis to New Orleans and out to the sea. We have on the Illinois River a 9-foot project from Utica to the mouth, which I hope to see modified and completed in the near future, making a 9-foot channel from Chicago and the Great Lakes down the Mississippi River to New Orleans and out to the sea. The Missouri River should be made a part of this great system with channel widths and depths sufficient to permit the free interchange of 9-foot barges fully loaded so that freight can be carried in 9-foot barges without transfer from Sioux City, and later beyond, across the United States to Pittsburgh and down the Mississippi to New Orleans, where it will be accessible to ocean steamers for all foreign ports. To permit the Missouri to remain a 6-foot channel will have the effect of keeping the Missouri River Valley upon a narrow-gage railroad while the commerce of the rest of the country is carried upon a wide-gage track.

Congress two years ago authorized a survey of the Missouri River from Kansas City to the mouth with a view to providing for a 6-foot channel. The improvements now going on upon this section of the Missouri for the establishment of a 6-foot channel can all be utilized in the making of a 9-foot channel. This survey should be made and the report should be available for the December session of Congress in order that a 9-foot channel upon the Missouri River from Kansas City to its mouth may be authorized in the next river and harbor bill.

The next river and harbor bill should contain authority for a survey with a view to determining the feasibility of a 9-foot channel upon the Missouri from Yankton to Kansas City, for there is no section of the United States more in need of relief which such a channel would afford than this great Missouri Valley, and if the Missouri River from Yankton to the mouth could be provided with a 9-foot channel, thus making it a part of this great waterway system, which in the near future ought to contain a 9-foot project upon the upper Mississippi from Minneapolis and St. Paul to St. Louis, then a great contribution will be made upon sound and economical lines toward the solution of the perplexing farm problem of the United States.

The products of the Missouri Valley are now tremendously handicapped in reaching the markets of our own country. We have in that part of the United States south of the Ohio and east of the Mississippi a great market for the products of the Missouri River Valley. If the Missouri could be improved to Yankton, the enormous reduction of freight rates which would follow would result in the construction of elevators at Cairo, Memphis, and Helena, so that the agricultural and feed products of this great section, utilizing a joint rail and water haul, could supply this southeastern area with profit to both sections of our country.

There is at Pittsburgh and along the upper Ohio River an enormous industrial area which needs the products of the Missouri River Valley. The average rail rate of the country, which apparently can not be reduced, is 11 mills per ton-mile. Commodities are being carried by lake steamers for 1 mill per ton-mile, and now that the Ohio is improved I am advised that coal is being carried upon this great river for 1 mill per ton-mile. This means that with a completed 9-foot channel between the agricultural area in the Missouri Valley and the great industrial area at Pittsburgh and along the upper Ohio steel and other commodities from one district can be exchanged for agricultural products from the other district at great profit to both, and nothing would contribute more to the prosperity and the increase of the taxable wealth of the whole country.

When such a waterway is completed and a dependable 9-foot channel is assured, elevators, flour mills, factories, and industries of all kinds will spring up along the Missouri, the population will increase, the cities will grow and prosper, and the hinterland of this great valley will thrive and develop as nature intended it should.

The Panama Canal from the day of its completion has served as a penalty upon this great Missouri Valley. It has enabled the products of the factories, the shops, and the mills of the Atlantic seaboard to interchange freely over the cheap water routes with the raw materials of the western seaboard, while the products of the Missouri River Valley, because of the excessive freight rates, have been unable to compete in the markets on either coast, with the result that the population of the cities upon the east and west coast have rapidly increased and their people have thrived and prospered while the Missouri River Valley has been stunted and its prosperity has been retarded and virtually destroyed.

To illustrate the hardships which the present rate structure imposes, there is developing in California and along the west coast an enormous poultry industry which consumes large quantities of grain products such as is produced in the Missouri Valley. Because of the present rates, the bulk of these agricultural products is being transported from Argentina by cheap water route along the east coast of South America through the Panama Canal and around to the west coast of our own country. A tariff sufficient to protect that market for the farm products of the Middle West would impose a hardship upon the consumers in California and the west coast. When a cheap water rate is established over nature's highway down the Missouri and Mississippi, through the Panama Canal and to the west coast, then the American producer and consumer of this commodity will both be benefited, and the prosperity of the whole country will be increased.

Our future markets are to the south of us, our trade with the West Indies, Central and South America has grown until it amounts to approximately, $1,400,000,000 annually, while our trade with France, Belgium, Germany, and Russia combined amounts to approximately $400,000,000 annually. The bulk of that trade to the south of us is now enjoyed by American producers along our seashores, and because of the cheap water rates from foreign ports they are practically the only sections of the United States that could meet the competition of the world in this rapidly growing market. If the Missouri Valley is to have its place in the sunshine of the commerce of the world, and especially if it is to enjoy its share of the trade in Central and South America, a dependable 9-foot channel must be provided upon the Missouri and out to the sea, and cheap water rates by the improvement of this dependable channel must be brought to this great agricultural area.

CHANNELS EITHER COMPLETED OR PARTIALLY COMPLETED

We have on the Ohio River a 9-foot project almost completed from Pittsburgh to Cairo; we have upon the Mississippi a 9-foot project to the sea; we have on the Illinois River a 9-foot project from Utica to the mouth, which will be completed within two years.

The Illinois waterway, which is being built by the State, will also be completed within that time, thus making a connection from Chicago to New Orleans by water.

In the present rivers and harbors bill, I have introduced a bill for a project leading from the mouth of the Illinois River to St. Louis, making that part of the Mississippi River a 9-foot channel. When that is completed, then there will be a continuous 9-foot channel from Chicago to New Orleans.

The Missouri River should be made a part of this great system with channel widths and depths so that the barges can be loaded and the freight carried in 9-foot barges without transfer from Sioux City and later beyond, across the United States to Pittsburgh and down the Mississippi to New Orleans, where it will be accessible to ocean steamers to all foreign ports.

A 6-FOOT CHANNEL ON TWO RIVERS

The upper Mississippi River and the Missouri River have won authorizations for a 6-foot channel.

The improvements now going on upon these sections of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers for the estimate of a 6-foot channel can all be utilized in the making of a 9-foot channel. A new survey should be made and the report should be available for the December session of Congress in order that a 9-foot channel upon the Missouri River from Kansas City to its mouth may be utilized for the next rivers and harbors bill and also upon the Mississippi River from St. Paul to the mouth of the Illinois River.

ADDITIONAL SURVEYS

The next rivers and harbors bill should contain authority for a survey with a view of determining the feasibility of a 9-foot channel to Kansas City, for there is no section of the United States more in need of relief which such a channel would afford than the great Missouri Valley, and if the Missouri River from Yankton to the mouth could be provided with a 9-foot channel, thus making it a part of this great inland waterway system when a 9-foot channel is completed from Yankton to the Mississippi River and from St. Paul to St. Louis, then a sound and economic contribution will have been added to the resources of the United States.

THE ST. LAWRENCE TO THE SEA

Some 10 years ago the proposition of developing the St. Lawrence River for ocean-going vessels was taken up in real earnest between the Governments of Canada and the United States. There was an exchange of notes between the two Governments in reference to the engineering phases of the project.

In the spring of 1927 the United States sent a note to Canada suggesting that we were ready to begin negotiating the treaty. Since that time, while some phases of the development have been agreed to, no definite understanding has been reached.

ECONOMIC VALUE OF ST. LAWRENCE

The St. Lawrence developed would be real farm relief, for it would reduce the export rate on wheat from Chicago and Duluth to Liverpool 10 cents a bushel. It would be one of the great instruments of completing the inland waterway system, but until such time as Canada will be willing to be fair with the United States it does not seem possible that it will be developed, and therefore it is my view that unless Canada is willing to do her part we should immediately negotiate with the State of New York and deepen to 12 feet the Erie Canal for a barge system, similar to what we have on the Mississippi system. In doing that you would have a way of shipping your products from Sioux City, Iowa, to Chicago through the Great Lakes, the Erie Canal, and the Hudson River to the Atlantic Ocean.

The policy of the administration is to build the waterways of the Nation. Herbert Hoover is its greatest friend and advocate. He believes in putting the rivers of the Nation to work; he is an engineer and can visualize their worth. He will push this development forward if given the opportunity by the Congress of the United States. We therefore should work in harmony with the President and not embarrass him by advocating impossible projects. We can confidently expect his support, and when every channel is completed we may assume that it was the man in the White House that made it possible.

And now, my friends, in conclusion let me say to you, the completion of this splendid waterway system, which constitutes America's greatest natural resource, will render a great service to the Nation and to the world.

This mighty empire, known as the Mississippi Valley, will become the most prosperous and productive portion of our Nation, the abiding place for happy, prosperous, and contented people, with the beneficent endowment of a generous Government, will encourage those virtues of citizenship and be the guaranty and the perpetuity of this great Republic.

RESTRICTED IMMIGRATION

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker, the Assembly of the State of California and the senate thereof recently passed Joint Resolution No. 11, which has been presented to the Senate by the President of the Senate and by the senior Senator from that State. I ask unanimous consent that it be read in my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

CALIFORNIA LEGISLATURE, ASSEMBLY CHAMBER,
FORTY-EIGHTH SESSION,
Sacramento.

Assembly Joint Resolution 11, relative to restricted immigration

Chapter 95

Whereas the legislature of this State has consistently urged adherence by the United States to a policy of restricted immigration; and

Whereas the present absence of restriction and supervision of immigration across the southern boundary line of the United States opens the door annually to thousands of citizens of the Republic of Mexico, to large numbers of citizens of nations under the quota who would otherwise be excluded, and to many aliens ineligible to citizenship; and

Whereas the standard of living of the great mass of citizens of the Republic of Mexico is such that no good reason exists why the citizens thereof should be given preference as to entry into the United States over the peoples of the European stocks from which the great majority of American citizens are descended; and

Whereas the influx of laborers across the Mexican border causes unfair and unjust competition to American labor, and at the same time abrogates and nullifies the beneficial results to be expected from a national policy of restrictive immigration; and

Whereas the continued unrestricted inflow of Mexican people and the rate of increase of those already here mean the gradual replacement of the American people by those of Mexican blood, and indicate that in the near future the populations of the Southern and Western States of the United States will become predominantly Mexican: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the legislature of this State protests against a continuance of the present unrestricted immigration from the Republic of Mexico; and be it further

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, respectfully petitioned and urgently requested promptly to provide legislation placing the Republic of Mexico within the provisions of the restrictive immigration laws of the United States and providing a proper annual immigration quota therefor; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each Senator and Representative in Congress from the State of California.

EDGAR C. LEVEY,
Speaker of the Assembly.

Attest:

ARTHUR A. OHNIMUS,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I have advice from a reliable source that this resolution passed the Assembly of the State of California by a vote of 42 to 6, and passed the senate of that State by a vote of 21 to 4. I had it read for the information of the House.

LIEUT. APOLLO SOUCEK

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute in order to make an announcement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I am sure the House will be glad to hear that the officials of the Bureau of Standards have just finished calibrating the instruments and verifying the sheets of the flight made by Lieut. Apollo Soucek, of the United States Navy, on June 4, 1929, and find that he reached an altitude of 38,560 feet, thereby establishing a new world record for altitude for seaplanes. [Applause.] On May 8, 1929, Lieutenant Soucek established a world record with a land plane, reaching an altitude of 29,140 feet, which record was taken away from the United States a few days later by Germany. The United States Navy is now preparing a plane with which it is expected that we will recapture that record. I feel sure that the applause and congratulations of every Member of the House go to the United States Navy and to Lieut. Apollo Soucek. [Applause.]

THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION OF 1928 AND THE ELECTORAL COLLEGE

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon a resolution which I recently introduced.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD upon a resolution recently introduced by him. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Speaker, the presidential election of 1928 again gave a striking demonstration of the crude, antiquated character and inherent injustice of the Electoral College system of electing the President. It demonstrated that the Electoral College should be abolished and a just, practical system provided in its stead.

Nearly 37,000,000 people voted at that election. Secretary Hoover received over 21,000,000 votes and Governor Smith over 15,000,000. The vote for Hoover was 58 per cent of the vote of the Nation and that of Smith 40 per cent. In the Electoral College Hoover received 444 electoral votes and Smith 87. In other words, Mr. Hoover had over 83 per cent of the electoral vote, or 25 per cent more of the electoral than the popular vote. Smith received a little over 16 per cent of the electoral vote, or about 24 per cent less than of the popular vote. Taking the vote of the Nation as a whole, an electoral vote for Hoover represented 48,180 popular votes and an electoral vote for Smith represented 172,602. In other words, an electoral vote for Smith represented more than three and one-half times as many people as an electoral vote for Hoover.

In 1912 Wilson received 435 electoral votes and Taft received 8. Each electoral vote for Wilson represented 14,451 voters and each for Taft 435,490. Each of Taft's electoral votes represented thirty-one times as many popular votes as an electoral vote for Wilson.

Smith received 15,000,000 votes. In the eight States he carried, he received 1,640,000 votes and their total electoral vote of 87. He received 13,576,000 votes in States from which he did not secure a single electoral vote. In other words, 1,640,000 popular votes gave him 87 electoral votes and 13,576,000 popular votes gave him no electoral vote.

Had the electoral vote of each State been divided between the candidates according to their proportion of the popular vote in each State, the total electoral vote would have been 231 for Smith and 291 for Hoover. As the votes were in fact counted, Smith had 29 that belonged to Hoover and Hoover had 175 that rightfully belonged to Smith.

Hoover received 2,200,000 votes in the State of New York. Smith received 2,100,000. Hoover had less than 50 per cent of the popular vote of New York, but received its entire 45 electoral votes. Smith received over 46 per cent of its popular vote and none of its electoral votes.

In Massachusetts, Smith received slightly over 50 per cent of the popular vote and Hoover over 49 per cent. Smith received the entire 18 electoral votes and Hoover received none.

Had 404,000 Hoover votes been properly dstributed in the eight States carried by Smith, the entire electoral vote would have been for Hoover. Smith, with 15,000,000 popular votes representing over 40 per cent of the popular vote of the Nation, would have been without a single electoral vote.

In the election of 1928, 38 per cent of all the electoral votes cast for Hoover and Smith were counted exactly opposite to the way intended by the people who cast the popular votes, which the electoral votes were supposed to represent. Only 62 per cent of the electoral votes of the Nation were counted in accordance with the will of the people those votes represented.

Manifestly such a system of counting votes is repugnant to any man's sense of fairness and political justice. No man can defend the Electoral College system unless he can defend a practice that takes from a minority candidate all credit for 49 per cent of the popular vote of a great State and gives the majority candidate the whole vote of the State. The only chance the minority candidate has to overcome the injustice of this irrational method of computing the result is to secure from other States of the country a similar or greater number of votes not intended for him but for his opponent. Such a system is not only inherently unjust but is morally vicious and indefensible.

FUNDAMENTAL VICE OF ELECTORAL COLLEGE SYSTEM

The fundamental vice of the Electoral College system is in counting the State vote as a unit. The whole electoral vote of the State goes to that candidate who receives only a part of the vote of its people. The plurality candidate receives the whole vote of the State regardless of whether he receives a majority of the State vote, and regardless of how large may be the minority vote of his opponents.

Let me illustrate the viciousness of the unit system. Suppose two candidates run for President. One candidate carries New York over the other candidate by 5,000 majority, and the other candidate who lost New York, carries Nevada by 5,000. Thus the popular vote of those two candidates would be exactly equal, but the man who carried New York would receive 45 electoral votes and the one who carried Nevada would receive only three electoral votes.

Under the Electoral College system, if the popular sentiment among the voters throughout the Nation was almost equally divided in each State, a candidate who received only 51 per cent of the popular vote in each State would receive all of the electoral vote. The candidate who received the other 49 per cent would not receive a single electoral vote, even though the minority candidate polled 49 per cent of the votes of the country.

You must agree there is absolutely no justice inherent in such a system of election. Whether or not political justice is accomplished is purely a matter of luck, a gamble, and does not depend upon the inherent quality of the law, because the Electoral College system has no inherent quality of political justice.

DISFRANCHISES VOTERS

In other words, the Electoral College system is a method of disfranchising minorities in every State of the Union, so far as the presidential election is concerned. The minority vote is not only not counted for the candidate for whom cast, but is, for every practical purpose, transferred to and counted for the majority candidate against whom it was cast. That is a system without reason or inherent justice. It is a system of legalized political immorality. If it were property instead of votes that was misappropriated, we would call it grand larceny or embezzlement.

Three times in our history, under this system of election, a candidate having the plurality for President has been defeated and a minority candidate selected to the Presidency.

In the election of 1912, in a three-cornered contest, President Wilson received 42 per cent of the popular vote of the country and 82 per cent of the electoral vote. That was a discrepancy of 40 per cent between the electoral and popular vote.

During the last 13 presidential elections the average discrepancy between the electoral and popular vote of the candidate elected has been over 15 per cent. No President elected during that time has received a majority of the popular vote equivalent to 11 per cent of the vote of the country.

In 1916 La Follette received 16 per cent of the popular vote of the country and only 3 per cent of the electoral vote.

DOUBTFUL STATES

Is it possible that a system of allocating electoral votes so in disregard of inherent justice should have no ill effect upon the political life of our country? The selection of a minority candidate over a plurality candidate, as has occurred three times in our history, is a political injustice of the first order. The only legitimate purpose of a popular election is to effectuate the will of the voters. A system that operates to produce a result directly opposite to that intended by the voters is condemned by its own incapacity to do political justice.

Under this system, in practical effect, the presidential election is reduced to a contest in a comparatively few "doubtful States." The result in most States is known and decided in advance. Minority votes are to be disfranchised and counted for the opposition. The whole vote of the State will go to one man. The presidential election in that State is reduced to the contemptible status of a theoretical contest, without minority votes, no matter how great the number, contributing to the final result.

Under this situation the Nation witnesses the evil political influences of the country concentrated in a few "doubtful States," where the unearned electoral votes may be most easily obtained. The turning of a few thousand votes may mean the total electoral votes of great States like Massachusetts, New York, Ohio, and Illinois, and the election for the whole Nation may thereby be won.

The Electoral College system makes the result of the election dependent on a few "doubtful" States. The effort is to "carry" those doubtful States. Under the proposed plan, whether any particular State was "carried" would be of little consequence. The fundamental effort of the candidates would be to secure as many votes as possible everywhere. The votes would become important in every State. Under the present plan a few thousand votes are of little consequence in the "solid" States. They would become of equal consequence with votes of every State in the Union under the plan I am proposing.

Many deplore the lessened interest of the people in our elections and public affairs. We could help improve general public interest by giving to the voters in presidential elections equal rights and a greater dignity and importance in practically every State in the country.

REASON FOR ELECTORAL COLLEGE

The Electoral College system was originally chosen as a means of selecting the President before we had any parties and when it was deemed best that the choice of a President should be left to a limited number of impartial presidential electors chosen by the various States to use their own best judgment. When the party system developed the presidential electors were deprived of all discretion as to whom they should select for President, and the reason for the Electoral College then ceased to exist. For nearly 140 years we have retained this archaic, antiquated, and inherently unjust system of electing the President.

THE PROPOSED PLAN

I have to-day presented to Congress House Joint Resolution 102 proposing to abolish the Electoral College system of electing a President. This resolution, if adopted, would do these definite things:

First. Abolish the Electoral College system of electing the President and Vice President.

Second. Provide for the direct election of the President and Vice President. Instead of voting for the presidential electors the people would vote directly for the presidential candidates.

Third. Each State would retain its proportion of electoral votes as at present. It would have electoral votes but not presidential electors.

Fourth. Each candidate would be given such proportion of the electoral votes of the State as his popular vote therein bears to the total vote for all candidates. The proportionate vote of the State would be substituted for the present unit vote. Instead of giving the whole vote of the State to the leading candidate, this amendment proposes to give to each candidate the part of the State vote given him by the voters, no more, no less.

Fifth. In the interest of simplicity a simple method of computing the results is provided under which fractional numbers less than one one-thousandth would be disregarded unless a more detailed calculation would change the result of the election.

Sixth. The person receiving the greatest number of electoral votes shall be elected. This avoids the possibility of a deadlock or the necessity of having an election in the House of Representatives or in the Senate.

TABLE ILLUSTRATES PLAN

Under the plan advanced in this proposal both Smith and Hoover would have received part of the electoral votes of every State in the Union. The electoral votes in each State would have been divided between them in exact proportion to the popular votes received by each.

I am presenting herewith a table showing the official results of the last election and also what the results would have been had the proposed plan been in operation.

The table, for purposes of illustrating the proposed plan, also includes the socialist vote for Thomas. Certain other candidates received small numbers of votes which it is unnecessary to include for the purpose of illustrating the proposed plan.

This table shows that had the votes for Hoover and Smith been justly apportioned in each State, according to the vote of the candidates, Hoover would have received 291.398 electoral votes and Smith 231.252, or a majority in favor of Hoover of over 60 electoral votes instead of 357.

Each candidate would have received exactly the number of electoral votes to which he was entitled according to the popular vote of each State. The division of the State vote would have been on a basis manifestly and inherently just to each candidate, and the result would have been an exact expression of the will of the people of the country.

A second table I present shows the relative distribution of the party votes at the last presidential election. An examination of this table will show, with some exceptions, a comparatively close parallel between the relative party strength of the two parties over the Nation.

Two parties of comparable strength are generally regarded as desirable to restrain and prod each other to the ultimate advantage of the country. The fairly comparable strength of one, as compared to the other, although differing greatly in strength, has a wholesome advantage to the country. This advantage is largely lost through the unit system of casting the State vote in presidential elections. Its advantage to the country would be greatly accentuated by an equitable division of the State vote between the two parties.

PUBLIC WELFARE REQUIRES THIS NEW PLAN

If this plan shall be adopted, we will no longer have "solid" sections. Minorities will be disfranchised in no State. The presidential contest will be transferred from the few doubtful States to every precinct in the Nation. Whether the individual citizen lives in Maine, California, Georgia, or Wisconsin, he will have the same motive to vote and help elect his man. Whether he belongs to the majority or the minority, his vote will be counted and be equally effective in determining the result of the election. It will no longer be possible to win the election by corrupting the electorate or stealing a few thousand votes in a few doubtful States. Efforts in that line will become futile. The few thousand votes will be deprived of their fictitious value. The small balance or majority in any State can no longer be used as a means of disfranchising the minority in the State and securing its total electoral vote. That vote will be apportioned according to the popular vote. Who is there interested in the welfare and future of our country, who should not welcome a new system of presidential elections, under which every voter of the Union can have an equal interest and equal part in determining the result of the presidential election? Under this proposed plan, the evils of the present system and of the sectional system will be minimized, if not disappear.

At the present time, the State vote is equally effective in electing a candidate whether his majority be 1,000 or 500,000. How much more wholesome would the political atmosphere be where each State contributes to the success of each candidate according to the proportion of popular support of its people.

WHY ELECTORAL VOTES?

On first impulse one is likely to assume that the proper substitute for the Electoral College system would be the aggregate voting system under which State lines would be disregarded, the whole vote computed and the election given to the candidate receiving the highest aggregate vote. A brief study of the situation will convince anyone of the futility of attempting to secure an amendment providing for such a system.

In the first place, without going into details, we have such an inequality between the States as to voting populations that it would be impossible to secure the ratification of such a proposal by a sufficient number of States. The percentage of people who vote under the different qualifications and conditions of States varies as much as 30 per cent. States of low percentage voting population would naturally be unwilling to place themselves on an equality with other States on a basis of voting population.

The present apportionment of voting strength of the States is based upon population and not on the number of voters. The State which has 2,000,000 inhabitants has a certain number of electoral votes regardless of the percentage of its population who may vote. Whether 10 or 35 per cent of its people vote is immaterial in determining the electoral vote it may have. This amendment does not propose a change in that fundamental basis of apportionment.

In the second place, the Constitution was finally agreed upon with a definite understanding that the little States were to have the advantage of equal representation in the Senate and consequently a superior advantage in the election of a President. Ten States have half the population of the country and 20 Senators. The other 38 have the other half of the population and 76 Senators. Each of these Senators is represented by an electoral vote, which has the effect of giving the little States 10 per cent advantage over the big States in the selection of a President. This power can not be taken from them without their own consent. They were assured that advantage on condition of which they entered the Union. It is impractical to attempt to deprive them of that right now.

The proposed plan abolishes presidential "electors" but retains electoral votes. In this way the relative strength of the States in the election of a President would be retained as at present. The "electoral votes" of the State, instead of being cast as a unit for the plurality candidate, however, would be divided among all candidates according to their popular votes.

COMPUTATION OF RESULTS

This plan would result in fractional votes. The mathematical problem is reduced to the simplest terms by providing that fractional numbers less than one one-thousandth shall be disregarded unless a more detailed calculation would change the result of the election. As illustrated by the annexed table, this means that only three figures are carried beyond the decimal point. Should any rarely close election result, fractions could be carried to the remotest figures to avoid any deadlock. In all human probability, it would never become necessary to tabulate figures beyond the third figure after the decimal point. A child in the eighth grade can compute the result without difficulty.

DEADLOCKS

Every intelligent system of election must provide a method of breaking deadlocks. The constitutional method of breaking deadlocks under the Electoral College system is objectionable as the system itself.

If, under a contest of three or more candidates, or for other reasons, any presidential candidate fails to receive a majority in the Electoral College, the election is thrown into the House of Representatives. The House of Representatives in such an election votes by States, each State having a vote which is cast as a unit, the Representatives from that State determining how such vote shall be cast. A majority of such State votes can elect even though such a majority may be made up of far less than a majority of the membership of the House. Pennsylvania, with 38 electoral votes, has no more power than Wyoming, with 3 electoral votes. New York, with 11,000,000 people, has no more power than Nevada, with 250,000 people.

In case of election in the House, the Members would probably divide, according to their party affiliations. The party control of a majority of the States may be different from a majority control of Congress, or the majority control of Congress may be in a different party from that which received the greatest plurality or even the majority vote at the presidential election. In either event there is no assurance that the candidate selected by the House of Representatives will be selected in accordance with the popular favor, even though the popular choice was clearly demonstrated in the presidential election. The Electoral College system gives no reliable assurance that the plurality candidate will be selected. Neither does the system of breaking deadlocks in the House of Representatives provide any assurance that the popular choice will be selected. This system of breaking deadlocks in the House provides a method by which the will of the people as established at the election may be thwarted.

If a deadlock for the election of the President is accomplished in the House, all presidential candidates are defeated and the breaking of the deadlock is left to the Senate, where a choice may be made between the two highest candidates for Vice President. There a majority vote of the Members prevails. Again there is no assurance that the popular will, which may have been clearly demonstrated in the presidential election, shall be carried out by the election of the people's choice.

Under the plan of election I propose a deadlock of the election between the candidates is impossible. One popular vote in any State in the Union, or even a fraction thereof, can break a deadlock. A separate vote is recorded in each State for Vice President, and even if a deadlock between the presidential candidates were possible, it would not be humanly possible as between the vice presidential candidates, and an election would result. The plurality candidate would be selected.

FOR BETTER GOVERNMENT

Our Electoral College system is crude in its operation, unreliably reflects public sentiment, is totally disqualified to meet the situation at any time when three sizable parties develop. It may at any time again result in the election of a minority over a plurality candidate, or even over a majority candidate. The electoral system tends toward the development of the one-party system in the State, creates indifference in the presidential election, disfranchises minorities in the State, and awards votes to the majority candidate that were in fact cast for the minority. The reason for the system disappeared 140 years ago. Its maintenance to this hour is a reflection upon the progressive intelligence of American statesmen.

I bespeak the interest and support of the friends of clean, efficient, popular government in order that this antiquated, unjust system may be abolished and be substituted by a system inherently just and wholesome in its political consequences.

FARM RELIEF

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, in connection with my remarks on the farm relief bill, I ask unanimous consent to include in an extension a brief statement made by me before the Committee on Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, the farm bill agreed upon by the conferees is an improvement over the bill H. R. 1. It would be a much better bill, though, if it included the export debenture plan, as proposed by the Senate.

Much good may be accomplished by the present bill if good men with the welfare of the farmers at heart are appointed as members of the board; otherwise the scheme provided here will become an awful failure. Nothing that may be said now will in the least change the provisions of the bill reported by the conferees. I sincerely hope the bill may prove to be better than I expect. Let us all hope for the best under its operation.

The farmers and their friends will not be satisfied with the bill unless it helps them get a much better net price for their farm products. In fact, I predict that the export debenture scheme will be later written into law and that the farmers will not be satisfied until Congress not only does this, but fulfills its promise to place the farmer on an economic parity with other industries. I have felt that it was my duty to criticize the House bill. I am glad the conferees eliminated several of the objectionable features of the bill and still feel that the objections urged against the House bill were and are thoroughly proper criticisms.

Mr. Speaker, it has been urged that those of us criticizing the present farm bill—H. R. 1—are inconsistent and making the present fight simply to embarrass the Republican administration, and not because at heart we believe in the merits of the export debenture plan proposed by the Senate.

I much rather a bill worthy of my support to the fullest extent was being passed. I have never sought to embarrass either a Republican or a Democrat fighting for the best interest of the farmer. I shall at all times, though, bitterly oppose those of both political parties, either in or out of office, who are enemies of worth-while farm legislation. The men in Congress who all the while are attempting to embarrass others are themselves most often embarrassed. They had better be discharging their duty rather than setting political traps and digging embarrassing pitfalls for others.

We are reminded of the Biblical injunction:

Whoso diggeth a pit shall fall therein; and he that rolleth a stone, it will return upon him.

Those who have not remained consistent and who have been setting traps for others are now most embarrassed politically by the present farm program. As usual, they are about to get caught in their own trap. They are about to become impaled in their own pit. Again, as usual, those caught in their own trap are making loud and long protestations of their own innocence. They are declaring some one else set the trap for them. Pitfalls are unfair to all, and ofttimes are more dangerous to those who dig them than to anyone else. It is a part of the eternal plan of justice and right that "he that rolleth a stone" with intent to injure another person shall himself be injured because of the very force he sets in motion, and "Whoso diggeth a pit shall fall therein."

Mr. Speaker, to more fully show my own consistency, to reinforce my position on farm relief, and to fully demonstrate that my present fight is not to embarrass anyone, but is the same it has always honestly been, I wish to quote from my statement made on February 25, 1928, before the House Committee on Agriculture, as follows:

Mr. ASWELL. Do you think you ought to vote your conviction whether you get a law or not?

Mr. LANKFORD. I am in favor of so amending the bill as to secure the passage of a good law at this time, if possible. I would not be in favor, let me say, of so amending this bill as to make it objectionable simply because we want to secure a law. There is danger always in legislation, as I see it, that goes just far enough to amount to an excuse of a bill, and yet not do what it ought to do for the farmer; and then the American farmer would feel like we had passed something for him, later on become dissatisfied with it and disheartened and not be willing even to have a stronger and better bill passed; and those who oppose real farm relief would later on say, "You have done this. You have passed a bill for the farmer. It is a failure. Why take up more time with farm relief?"

I do favor the passage of a bill which will be real farm relief. I would not favor a bill which I thought would not help the farmer, but which might wreck his hopes for a measure in the future.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. LANKFORD, is the McNary-Haugen bill as it is drawn and pending before the committee, with the equalization fee eliminated, your choice of the bills, so far pending before the committee?

Mr. LANKFORD. No; I would prefer the bill I introduced, Mr. KINCHELOE. But of the bills other than mine to which your committee has given consideration and upon which you had hearings before you came to my bill I would prefer the McNary-Haugen bill with the equalization fee eliminated—I would prefer that to the Crisp-Curtis bill.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Or the debenture plan?

Mr. LANKFORD. I think the debenture plan could be passed along with the McNary-Haugen bill, as they are not inconsistent. You might pass the debenture plan and raise money for the farmer in that way through the sale of debentures and still pass the McNary-Haugen bill. They are not inconsistent at all, as I see it; they could be worked in harmony; they could be worked both at the same time. I do not see that the passing of the debenture plan would prevent the passage of the McNary-Haugen bill. I think you could pass the McNary-Haugen bill, with the equalization fee or without it, and also pass the debenture plan, if you wished.

I like the debenture plan; I think the debenture plan would help the American farmer. I believe it would cause him to get more for his products. I do believe that the debenture plan falls down on one proposition. I do not believe the debenture plan solves sufficiently the question of overproduction, and I think that is the greatest problem of all. The one problem which must be solved eventually is the control of production and marketing in behalf of the farmer.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Do you think the McNary-Haugen bill would do it with the equalization fee eliminated? That is the question which has been bothering my mind a long time.

Mr. LANKFORD. Of course, it would enable the board to take cotton off the market, as has been explained here. I have never been very strong for the McNary-Haugen bill. I voted for it, however, as the best bill in sight.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I mean overproduction. You take the Curtis-Crisp bill and these other bills—and I am not saying that in a criticizing way. I know it is as fundamentally sound as anything in the world that whenever you increase the price of agricultural products in this country—that is, if the seasons are favorable—you are going to increase production.

Mr. LANKFORD. You are going to increase production.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Absolutely.

Mr. LANKFORD. And you wreck the very machinery by which you propose helping the American farmer. So the greatest problem is the control of overproduction or the problem of marketing what has been produced. It would be all right for the American farmer to produce an abundance if he was able to keep it off the market. If he is able to look the world in the face and say, "It does not make any difference what I produce, I am not offering it for sale at all, and you can not get it."

Mr. PURNELL. What, in substance, is your plan?

Mr. LANKFORD. The bill I introduced is H. R. 77, patterned along the line of the War Finance Corporation act. I used the War Finance Corporation act as a basis for my bill. I used the first six or seven sections of that act, simply changing the name of the agency to the farmers' finance corporation.

Section 8 provides—

"that the corporation shall be empowered and authorized to make advances on farm products as collateral security to any bank, banker, trust company, or farm organization in the United States which has rendered financial assistance to any farmer, group of farmers, or farm organizations."

And this plan is a little different from the plan of ordinary bills, and I want to get it thoroughly before this committee.

Let me go over that again. The bill provides for the advance of money to certain banks, provided those banks have made advances to individual farmers of money.

"Provided—"

now here is the milk of the coconut and the gist and heart of the bill, if it has any—

"these advances are made through the banks only to the individual farmer: And provided, The farmers receiving such financial assistance shall have entered into contract with the corporation, as set out in section 11 of this act, and shall have kept and abided by all contracts so made."

Now this contract, which is set out in the bill, is a rough, crude contract drawn by me—which could be amended by the committee—provides that these farmers shall control their production as dictated and as determined by the cotton advisory council or the wheat advisory council, or other commodity advisory council.

It provides further that not only shall these farmers control the acreage which they plant each year, but they agree and obligate themselves not to sell any cotton whatever after they begin obtaining these loans, unless the cotton advisory council determines that a sale shall be made.

Mr. PURNELL. In other words, they borrow money on their crop and hold it on their own farms?

Mr. LANKFORD. On their own farms, or in warehouses, or in whatever way is necessary, so as to make the cotton to be produced actually for the debt. The plan is simply this, stated in other words, that we will create the farmers finance corporation, which will loan money through the banks, to the individual farmers, to enable them to hold their cotton, provided the planters of 75 per cent of the acreage of cotton in the United States shall have signed the contracts agreeing to the control of their acreage planting, and agreeing to a control of the marketing.

Mr. PURNELL. What percentage of the value of the crop held by each individual farmer would you permit him to draw a loan upon?

Mr. LANKFORD. The bill provides for loans to the full value of the commodities. I say in the bill that he shall be authorized to borrow the average price at which that cotton has sold for the last 10 years.

Mr. ASWELL. Do you think you could get 75 per cent of the planters to sign that?

Mr. LANKFORD. I do not know; I believe we could. I believe you would be offering the farmers so much under this bill that they would sign up. I have great faith in the American farmer signing up contracts if you once offer him something to sign for.

Mr. PURNELL. In other words, you give him a loan on the basis of the full market value at the time the loan is made?

Mr. LANKFORD. No; I would go further, the bill provides for the full market average value for which the commodity sold for the preceding 10 years, which might be higher than the value at time of the loan

I realize this, Mr. PURNELL, that if you loan the farmer the average price at which cotton has sold for the last 10 years or the average price at which wheat has sold for the last 10 years; and cotton is selling at 4 or 5 cents below that, or wheat is selling at several cents below that price, it would be a foolish thing for the Government's agency to make that kind of a loan without additional safeguards.

Mr. PURNELL. Suppose the market price is below that average and a loss is sustained. Who is to pay that?

Mr. LANKFORD. That is a proper question and I am glad to answer it.

If 75 per cent of the producers of a commodity sign contracts that they will control their production, and, furthermore, that not only will they control their production, but that they will not offer for sale a single bushel of wheat or a single pound of cotton when the operation begins, but that they will hold it; if they need money they will borrow it from the bank and only sell for a fair price there will be no loss. The price can not drop below that average price at which they can borrow money. Why? Because the farmer will not sell below a price at which he can borrow money under the provisions of this bill. I provide in the bill that the commodity itself shall be the sole and only collateral for the debt, and that no judgment can be taken against the individual farmer for any loss.

Mr. ADKINS. Will you yield for a question?

Mr. LANKFORD. Yes; I will be glad to, Mr. ADKINS.

Mr. ADKINS. In my own country, where they have only 5 per cent of the storage facilities for wheat and oats, do you think you can get them to go into a contract of that kind?

Mr. LANKFORD. I am not so sure about that in the wheat section. Of course, if they could get them to go into it I believe it would work. You know more about the wheat proposition than I do.

I provide in the bill that there shall be such storage as shall be necessary, and I provide further in the bill that if possible and practical and feasible that the farmer be allowed to keep his commodity and store it himself, by properly insuring it, and making him responsible for it.

Mr. ADKINS. The point I had in mind is that practically all of them have practically no storage facilities for that, whether they would go into a contract of that kind or not and then have to build storage bins.

Mr. LANKFORD. I believe it can be worked out. It can be worked out for them to hold it separately or that wheat to be stored in bins and shipped to places where it could be held, but for the farmer still to retain his title in so many bushels of wheat of a certain grade, stored for his use. He could hold the receipt instead of holding the actual wheat.

Mr. SWANK. Do you make any provision for the acquisition of warehouses?

Mr. LANKFORD. I left that as a matter of detail to be worked out later. If the committee should decide that my bill embodies a good idea, that is properly a matter that can be worked out later.

I provide, if possible, that you would let the individual farmer hold his own commodity. He might conceivably ship it off, but it would be a crime, and I believe the average farmer can be trusted to hold it; and the loans being made through the banks, and the banks, knowing that that commodity is put up as collateral, would keep in touch with the collateral.

Mr. JONES. Just a question there: If you put that plan into operation and had your 75 per cent to sign, what would there be to prevent the other 25 per cent from increasing their acreage or making their sales any time they wanted to and taking advantage and possibly getting a higher price than those who had signed?

Mr. LANKFORD. The bill would prevent that.

Mr. JONES. What would there be to prevent new acreage by people who had not theretofore been in business?

Mr. LANKFORD. The question of new acreage would be solved under provisions in the bill. I provide this, however, that these loans shall only be made when planters of 75 per cent of the acreage for the ensuing year have signed the contract, to control the production and marketing. The bill provides that 10 per cent more must sign within 12 months from the time operations begin, and therefore 85 per cent must come in within 12 months after operation. Then I provide, further, that 10 per cent more must come in within the next year; and then that 7 per cent more shall come in within the next year, running it up to 97 per cent of the planters.

If the bill does work, if the plan is a good one, and if the American farmer finds he can borrow at the average price of his commodity and that there has been an organization perfected which enables him to control his production, which enables him to control the price, and name his price within reason, they will sign up 10 per cent more each year until they have 97 per cent in. The other fellows will be forced in just like labor unions force them in when they cry "scab," "not friends," "not in sympathy with the laboring man," "not dealing fair," etc. In other words, I believe they will sign up these contracts. If they do sign up these contracts, then it would solve the overproduction problem and marketing problem, and would enable the farmer to do exactly what I said that my father could not do in the way of naming the price of his cotton. It would enable the farmers by this organization to get together and simply say, "We will not sell cotton or wheat except at a certain price. We produced this year an alleged overproduction, but that overproduction does not hurt you; it is not for sale." Or, "We have for sale as much wheat as you need at a reasonably fair price. We have only as much cotton for sale as you are willing to pay us a fair price for."

The farmer for once in the history of the world by this organization could look the rest of the world in the face and say, "Cotton is so much a pound; how much do you want?" Or "Wheat is so much a bushel; how much do you want?" He could not do that to an unreasonable extent; he could not name a price of $5 a bushel for wheat; he could not name a price of a dollar a pound for cotton. But he could name a price for his commodity within reason, just like the producers of steel and the producers of shoes and the producers of hats and clothing name the price of the articles which they produce, within reason.

Mr. JONES. Unfortunately, he could do that, if he could get anything like approximately a hundred per cent, law or no law. If you got 97 per cent in, you would not need any law.

Mr. LANKFORD. This is true, that if it worked at all the Government could not lose any money on it and then, again, in a little while the farmer would be absolutely independent; he would be absolutely master of his own fate and his own destiny.

The bill has another idea, Mr. JONES, and I will come to you, Mr. MENGES, later; I see your hand up for a question.

There is another feature of the bill which I think is really worth while, and that is this: It has a complete referendum in it. If you pass the McNary-Haugen bill, the farmer may say he does not want it. If you pass my bill, it enables 75 per cent of the producers of commodities to sign contracts and organize. Suppose they do not do it? No harm has been done. Suppose they sign up 75 per cent, and then decide they do not want it next year; it goes out of force and out of effect; they determine whether the bill shall go into operation; they determine whether 75 per cent under the bill shall begin operations as to any particular commodity.

They might decide they want to operate as to cotton and let the McNary-Haugen bill apply as to wheat and other commodities. If they liked it, they would get the additional signers; if they did not like it, they would not get new signers and they would repeal the bill. That is a most perfect referendum, not to the voters of the country, but to the producers themselves; not to a majority, but to three-fourths of them. If the bill is not good, it would not go into effect; if it is good and they keep it in effect it provides for the control of production and marketing, not by force, not by low prices, not by an equalization fee, not by anything else, but by a contract entered into mutually for the farmers themselves. All right, Mr. MENGES, I will be glad to yield to you.

Mr. MENGES. Your bill would not go into operation then until 75 per cent of the farmers had signed your contract?

Mr. LANKFORD. It would not.

Later, during the same remarks, I said:

The great trouble with the farmer to-day is that he can not control his sales. He can not control the time when he is going to sell his commodity. Why? Because his taxes are due, his interest is due, or because his bank note is due. He must sell his cotton. But cotton is down in price. He can not wait for it to go up. But if my bill goes into effect he can borrow the average price at which the cotton has been selling for the past 10 years and put his cotton up as the sole security. My bill would stabilize the price at the figure at which he could borrow. He would sign the contract because he would know that unless enough signed it to make it effective, the contract would not go into effect, and he would know that whenever enough signed it to carry it into effect then the price would be stabilized.

On February 25, 1928, I addressed the House Committee on Agriculture, in conclusion, as follows:

The farmers organized and won our independence more than a century ago. They have organized and given their country assistance in every war. They helped to put over the Liberty loan drive during the last war and sent their sons across the seas to fight at the call of their country. So, Mr. Chairman, I am sure they will enter into a plan with their neighbors to win for them and their children a new freedom of naming within reason the price of the products of their own toil. Let us do our part and knowing the farmers as I do, I vouch for their faithful discharge of their duty in full, as they have ever done.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank you and this committee for the courtesies shown me and for your most attentive attention to my presentation of this matter, in which we are all so much interested.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Mr. LANKFORD; your statement is greatly appreciated.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the House of the following title, which was thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H. R. 1648. An act to amend section 5 of the second Liberty bond act, as amended.

BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee did on this day present to the President, for his approval, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 3083. An act to amend subsection (a) of section 26 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended by the settlement of war claims act of 1928, so as to authorize the allocation of the unallocated interest fund in accordance with the records of the Alien Property Custodian.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—FARM RELIEF

AGRICULTURAL MARKETING ACT

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, the House has to-day adopted the conference report on the farm bill. Under the leave to extend my remarks, I desire to submit a few observations on the export debenture plan, inasmuch as I have gladly cooperated with the administration and other friends of agriculture in passing agricultural legislation at this session. I represent a cotton district and I am thinking particularly of the plan in connection with the marketing of cotton.

There is universal agreement that the tariff can not be utilized for controlling or increasing prices of agricultural commodities of which there is produced an exportable surplus, like cotton, wheat, and corn.

The condition of the farmer can be improved by lowering the costs of goods which he buys or by raising the prices of the products that he sells. Reduction in the tariff generally will benefit the farmer. However, the domestic market is far more important than the foreign market. The United States is definitely committed to a tariff policy that amounts to protection to American industry. That policy will obtain until exports are overwhelmingly industrial. For some time to come the material reduction in tariff rates for the benefit of agriculture might as well be eliminated. Inasmuch as either a tariff or increased tariffs on staple commodities like wheat and short-staple cotton, where we are on an export basis, are not effective, the aim of agricultural legislation for the past decade has been to give to agriculture the unquestioned and equivalent benefits of the tariff.

The farmer asks that the spirit of the tariff be applied to his problem. He maintains that he can not pay the protected price for labor and other production factors and at the same time sell at the foreign price level.

The purpose of agricultural legislation is to place farming on an equality with manufacturing. It is admitted that protection results in great benefits to the manufacturer and his employees. It is axiomatic that the cost of this production is borne by the American consumer, which is the general public. It is maintained that equivalent benefits to agriculture should also be borne by the general public. It is the aim of farm legislation, either to make the tariff effective as to agriculture, or give to farming a benefit equivalent to that accorded to manufacturing.

Various plans have been proposed. The equalization fee has been advocated. It was embodied in the two bills passed by the Seventieth Congress and vetoed by President Coolidge. It is opposed by President Hoover. Its effects are doubtful. Its operations are quite complicated. In the case of cotton, where from 60 to 70 per cent is exported, an equalization fee in and of itself could scarcely be of benefit to the grower.

The export debenture plan is now proposed. It was first suggested by David Lubin, a member of the California Grange, in 1892. It was proposed by Prof. Charles L. Stewart, of the University of Illinois, and embraced in bills introduced in Congress in 1926 and in 1928.

The purpose underlying the debenture plan, according to its proponents, is to increase the domestic price above the world price. My thoughts are centered very largely around the effect on the price of cotton, and it is important to keep in mind that we export a far larger percentage of the cotton crop than we do of any other staple commodity. In truth, our exports always exceed domestic consumption. An increase in the domestic price, without a corresponding increase in the world price, would certainly be of doubtful and most precarious benefit to the cotton grower.

In the present extra session of Congress, the Senate has embraced the export debenture plan as an optional feature in the farm bill passed by the Senate. The plan provides that exporters of agricultural products shall receive from the Federal Treasury certificates that are negotiable and that are intended to represent the difference in the costs of production here and abroad. Such certificates can be used only in the payment of import duties. The purpose is to make the tariff effective on agricultural products.

BOUNTY

It has been suggested that debentures are in substance a bounty. The magic of a great name has been invoked in support of the plan. It is said that Alexander Hamilton in his celebrated Report on Manufactures, advocated bounties for agricultural products. There are but few instances of subsidies in our history. A subsidy is a direct payment to encourage productions or operations. The American people prefer indirection in such matters. We favor subsidies only indirectly. Indirect subsidies obtain in the merchant marine and in aid of transportation. A direct bounty or subsidy is of doubtful constitutionality. The revenue act of 1890, which was repealed on August 28, 1924, provided a bounty on sugar.

The constitutionality of bounties on production or on exports has not been determined. The Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, in the case of United States v. Carlyle (5 App. D. C. 138) held that the sugar bounty of 1890 was unconstitutional. It is true that Hamilton indorsed the principle of bounties. His primary concern was the promotion of manufactures. He favored the application of bounties, only to the extent of encouraging the domestic production of agriculture. Those who argue for the payment of a direct bounty to the farmer overlook the constitutional difficulties. The debenture plan is intended to obviate the constitutional objections. The Treasury would issue debentures just as it now issues drawback certificates, tobacco revenue stamps, and similar instruments under the tariff act. The export debenture plan would be no more a subsidy than the tariff drawback privileges now accorded to many American manufacturers, or the tariff reductions given to Cuban sugar.

The intention is to bring tariff benefits to the grower of crops of which there is an exportable surplus. Certificates of debenture would be issued by customs officials to exporters. Unless tariff benefits corresponding to those enjoyed by other groups are extended to the farmer, there can be no equivalent for agriculture. Those who produce exportable farm surpluses are obliged to pay tariff costs, while they sell their products at the world price.

CRITICISMS

The debenture plan like all bounties must presuppose to be effective, at least an equivalent import duty, otherwise the aim of the debenture or bounty would be defeated, since the entire output of a commodity might be exported and some of it reimported for domestic purposes. A direct bounty or a debenture without proper safeguards would undoubtedly increase production.

Bounties have been used only to increase domestic production so that the country can be economically self-sustaining. They have never been used either to raise the domestic price or to promote the handling of crops where there is produced an exportable surplus. The plan has certainly never been used in handling a crop like cotton, where more than one-half is exported. It is not my purpose to criticize without offering constructive measures. I know that inequality obtains. I am profoundly interested in removing it. Bounties and subsidies are no new things. They have been tried in other countries. We are asked to adopt the debenture because import debentures have been used by Germany, Sweden, Czechoslovakia, and England. The conditions under which the plan was used in foreign countries must be kept in mind. It has only been used to encourage domestic production in modern times.

Production is not our problem. Price is our aim. The purpose of its use in Germany was to encourage the production of sugar beets. It was used to equalize the benefits of the tariff in different sections of Germany. Bounties were abandoned in England almost a century ago. They were undoubtedly used there to encourage exports of agricultural products. The purpose was to increase domestic production. It must be borne in mind that the use of the bounty in England was under vastly different conditions from those prevailing in the United States. There was not quick and easy transportation and communication. The area for the growth of agricultural crops was limited. In the United States vast areas can be utilized in still further cultivation of exportable farm crops. Moreover, even in England there was a price fixed where the bounty became inoperative.

EQUALITY

I have but scant patience with those who advocate high tariffs and oppose the debenture plan because it is a subsidy. The American farmer must compete with cheap foreign labor. He is handicapped by paying for costs of protection to manufactures while he is denied the benefits that they promote. The farmer is no beggar or supplicant. He merely asks for justice. The theory of the debenture is the application of the tariff to agriculture. It is putting the protective policy in reverse, to use an automobile term.

The manufacturer begs the question when he says that the farmer should be more efficient. The manufacturer is selfish when he says that the farmer lacks initiative and that he is wanting in energy.

The manufacturer should be the last person in the world to criticize and denounce the farmer for asking for the equivalent benefit of the tariff. If the manufacturer, with his boasted mass production, with modern machinery, with thorough organization, with efficient labor, can not compete with the foreign manufacturer, without high and prohibitive duties, it does not lie in his mouth to deny equivalent benefits to the farmer. The tariff is in reality a subsidy. The plan of the debenture is to merely reduce the receipts from the tariff. Why deny the farmer the equivalent benefits of the tariff?

I want to give the domestic producer in agriculture equality. Candor compels me to say, however, that those who advocate the debenture plan, by invoking the bounties advocated by Alexander Hamilton, have not produced an argument directly in point. The comparison is superficial. Hamilton stood for protection for infant industries. He stood for bounties to encourage domestic production in agriculture. He did not advocate a bounty to encourage exports of agriculture, nor did he advocate a bounty of agricultural products where exports had been produced for a long time.

COTTON

It is true that there is a debenture of 2 cents a pound on cotton in the Senate farm bill. There are restrictions against reimports and against production. I know the argument is that the debenture will increase the domestic price by the amount of the debenture rate. There is no magic about 2 cents a pound. The bills carrying the debenture plan introduced in 1926 and 1928 provided a rate of from 4 to 6 cents a pound on cotton. I doubt if a debenture that can not be received directly by the grower will be of material benefit to the farmer. It may result in benefits to the exporter alone. It will not suffice to raise the domestic price of cotton unless the world price is increased at the same time.

Again, I am much concerned about the ultimate effects of the debenture. I believe that Congress can pass legislation for the aid of agriculture. I believe that it can promote the interests of the cotton grower. I know there is inequality. It should be removed. I can not get my consent to believe, however, that the debenture plan suggested to Congress but little more than three years ago by a college professor in Illinois, although now fostered by the Grange, is the solution of the problem, and particularly as it relates to cotton. I had rather endure present evils than to embark upon a policy of greater hazards. Neither the Democratic nor the Republican Party has ever advocated the debenture plan. It is without political paternity.

There should be a modification of our national policy to correct the discrimination against farmers. This conclusion, however, carries no presumption in favor of the debenture plan or any other particular mode of correction of policies that discriminates against the farmer. The objections I suggest do not dispose of the problem finally. The debenture plan may be justified, even if many of the arguments in its support are unsound. Surely there is much need for careful examination and thorough investigation of the proposed measure, with its ultimate result, before it is adopted as a national policy. I do not condemn the conferees on the pending farm bill for its elimination. The House has done well to-day to approve the report without the plan.

What is the solution of the problem for the cotton grower? He is more sinned against than any other group. The tariff can not be used for the great body of the cotton crop. It would undoubtedly be of benefit to long-staple cotton, which is approximately 5 per cent of the domestic production.

The chief problems of cotton are the instability of price and periodic surpluses. By surplus I mean periodic overproduction. The great aim of the cotton grower is the stabilization of the price. The chief benefit from agricultural legislation will be loans from the revolving fund, which the Government should provide to prevent unduly the depression of prices resulting from a seasonal surplus, and further to prevent marked declines because of large crops. Cotton can be warehoused. The Federal farm board can do for cotton what the Interstate Commerce Commission has done for transportation. The revolving fund could be utilized to enable the cotton grower to receive the costs of efficient production. It is one of the courses of nature that one large crop is not followed by another. Abundant successive crops are unusual. The Government can aid the cotton grower. The tariff is not the remedy for short-staple cotton. The debenture plan may result in even further depressing the price.

THE REMEDY

The Government can aid by providing a farm board with a large revolving fund to stabilize prices, to iron out the seasonal as well as the periodic fluctuations. Such a program would not be a panacea for all agricultural ills. It would be a great step in the right direction. A further aid would be a reduction in high tariff rates on articles and products that must be used by the cotton grower. This policy would not involve a complete reversal of the tariff policy that now obtains, but it would be in aid of equality for agriculture, inasmuch as the products used by the cotton grower are largely the products used by other growers of crops of which we produce an exportable surplus. Moreover, if tariffs are maintained to stimulate domestic production by either eliminating or making less effective foreign competition, and if the aim of industrial tariffs is to increase the volume and variety of manufactures, rather than the wealth of the owners of the factories, equivalent or substantial benefits where the tariff can not be effective will result to agriculture by the passage of the farm legislation providing for a central board, with a large revolving fund to stabilize prices of cotton and other exportable crops, and to provide for the surplus.

The American farmer only asks that he be granted the equivalent benefits of the legislation passed for the benefit of manufacturing, transportation, and banking. He pleads for agricultural legislation that will preserve the American farmer as a landowner and a home builder, and that will lead him to contentment and prosperity.

SUBSIDIES FOR RAILROADS, STEEL TRUST, AND FOREIGNERS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, there is a great deal being said against the debenture plan for the cotton and wheat growers on the theory that it is a subsidy to the farmers.

Granting, for the sake of discussion, that it is a subsidy, the farmers are as much entitled, and more, to a Government subsidy as any business or industry in the United States.

Many of the daily newspapers are condemning the debenture plan and saying it is economically unsound and wrong in principle because it is a subsidy. Daily newspapers receive a special postage rate, and in that way receive a subsidy from the Government. No postage is required in the county of publication, and out of the county they receive such a low postage rate that the Government is spending about $50,000,000 each year more than the revenue received from that source. Therefore the taxpayers of our Nation are giving the daily newspapers a subsidy or bounty equal to $137,000 a day.

The Interstate Commerce Commission permits certain industrial concerns and foreigners to receive a special freight rate from the railroads, which is equal to a subsidy. Our freight rate structure in the United States is so arranged that if a commodity is transported for less than cost to the railroads, that other commodities must pay a higher rate in order to make up for this loss and guarantee the railroads a fair return on their investment. Either the railroads are charging 100 per cent too much for freight rates on certain commodities or certain commodities are being transported over railroads 50 per cent too cheap.

In making the following observations we will presume that each carload contains 50,000 pounds.

The freight rate on agricultural implements from Chicago, Ill., to Galveston, Tex., is 41½ cents per 100 pounds if the agricultural implements go to foreign countries, but if they are used by the farmers of Texas, or used in the United States, the rate is $1.05 per 100 pounds. The cost of transporting a carload is $207.50 if intended for export. If intended for domestic use, the freight rate is $525 a car. There is a direct subsidy to the Steel Trust and foreigners equal to $318.50 a carload on agricultural implements.

The rate on cement from Chicago to Galveston, if intended for export, is 23½ cents per 100 pounds, but if intended for domestic use or consumption the rate is 79 cents per 100 pounds. The charges on the car between the two points for export are $117.50; whereas if it is intended to be used by the home owners and farmers of Texas, or by the State to build roads, the charges are $395 a car. Either the export rate is one-third of what it really should be or the domestic rate is three times what it should be. The freight charges on cement from St. Louis to New Orleans are $87.50 a car if intended for export, but $372.50 a car if intended for domestic consumption. Either the export rate is just 25 per cent of what it should be or our American people are charged four times too much. The freight charges on a car of fertilizer from St. Louis to Galveston are $115 a car if intended for export, but $180 a car if intended for domestic consumption.

The freight charges on salt from Indianapolis, Ind., to Galveston are $145 if intended for export, but $390 if shipped for domestic consumption.

Petroleum products can be transported from Chicago to Galveston at a rate of 28½ cents per 100 pounds, or $142.50 a car, if intended for export, but if intended for domestic consumption the rate is $1.05 per 100 pounds, or $525 a car. Such products can be transported from St. Louis to New Orleans for 22 cents per 100 pounds, or $110 a car, if intended for export, but 86 cents per 100 pounds, or $430 a car is charged if intended for domestic consumption.

Packing-house products can be transported from Chicago to Galveston for 39 cents per 100 pounds, or $195 a car, if intended for export, but if intended to be consumed by the American people in the United States the rate is $1.05 per 100 pounds, or $525 a car.

The freight charges on dry goods from Pittsburgh, Pa., to San Francisco, Calif., are $1.44 per 100 pounds, or $720 a car, if intended for export, but are $1.73 per 100 pounds, or $865 a car, if intended for domestic consumption.

The rate on packing-house products from Mason City, Iowa, to Galveston is 53½ cents per 100 pounds, or $267.50 a car, if intended for export, but $1.06 per 100 pounds, or $530 a car, if intended to be consumed by the American people in the United States.

The freight charges on packing-house products from Mankato, Minn., to Galveston, Tex., is 53½ cents per 100 pounds, or $267.50 a car, if intended for export and $1.14 per 100 pounds, or $572.50 a car, if intended to be consumed by Americans in the United States.

The railroad transportation charges on cement from Cincinnati, Ohio, to Galveston, Tex., are 17½ cents per 100 pounds, or $87.50 a car, if intended for export, and 44½ cents per 100 pounds, or $222.50 a car, if intended for domestic consumption.

The railroad freight charges on cottonseed meal from Louisville, Ky., to Galveston are 29½ cents per 100 pounds, or $147.50 a car, if intended for export, and 81 cents per 100 pounds, or $405 a car, if intended for domestic consumption.

The rate on pig iron from Portsmouth, Ohio, to Boston, Mass., is 26 cents per 100 pounds, or $130 a car, if intended for export, and 46½ cents per 100 pounds, or $232.50 a car, if intended for domestic consumption.

The freight charges on iron and steel from Chicago, Ill., to San Francisco, Calif., are 40 cents a hundred pounds, or $200 a car, if intended for export, but $1 per 100 pounds, or $500 a car, if intended for domestic consumption.

The rate on cotton in compressed bales from Oklahoma City to Galveston is 88 cents if intended for export and 83 cents per 100 pounds for domestic consumption. From Little Rock, Ark., to Galveston, Tex., 75 cents per 100 pounds for export and 73 cents per 100 pounds for domestic consumption. From Wichita Falls, Tex., to Galveston, Tex., 65 cents per 100 pounds export rate and 63 cents per 100 pounds domestic rate.

The above information is compiled from data furnished to me by the Interstate Commerce Commission and contains a comparative statement of export with domestic rates in force on May 29, 1929.

With reference to rates on cotton to Galveston, it is seen that where the export rates are higher than the domestic rates, the export rates reflect expenses incidental to delivery to ship side at the port.

It will be noticed that foreigners and industrial concerns, as well as railroads and daily newspapers, are receiving a subsidy from our Government at the expense of the American taxpayers and the farmers and laborers of our Nation. If a subsidy is fair for special interests and big business, it is certainly fair for the people who produce the wealth of our Nation, the ones who build our country in time of peace and who save our country in time of war.

Mr. HALL of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the farm bill now under consideration as it comes from the Senate and House conference and recommended for passage by that conference provides, in my opinion, an agency for accomplishing certain beneficent results for agriculture. Very properly, however, it does not assume the wisdom to know what detailed action will be necessary in the future to attain these objectives. The agency thereby created is the Federal farm board, and will be clothed with sufficient powers and will be provided with ample means to find and to put in effect the methods destined to accomplish the purposes we all so sincerely seek. This is exactly the theory on which the Federal Reserve Board was created to handle the problems arising out of the complexities of business, and upon which the Interstate Commerce Commission was created to regulate transportation. In neither of the latter cases did the initial legislation attempt to foresee or to provide for every condition with which these agencies would be confronted. They had to feel their way, adjust means to ends, and work out details of procedure under their powers as necessity and experience showed the way.

This is just exactly what this new agency, created to put agriculture on an economic equality with industry, must now do. It will have the authority and the money with which to find the way and the degree of success that it shall have in accomplishing its declared purpose depends largely upon the personnel of the board which shall be selected to put it into operation. The bill as now presented is capable of such action as will make the tariff more effective on all farm crops to the end that periodical surpluses shall not be permitted to depress the domestic price to the world level of prices. The bill is so constructed that the control and disposition of agricultural surpluses may adequately be provided for. The bill contains provisions which are practically automatic in their operation to the end that overproduction may be checked. It provides for farmer-owned and farmer-controlled marketing organizations, and without doubt due consideration to existing cooperative associations will be given by the board. These provisions when in operation and intelligently administered will in the judgment of the studious friends of the farming industry produce the results desired. There are other agencies now in contemplation and in construction that will have a tendency when completed to assist in bringing about these results. One of the most important of these, in my judgment, is the Lakes-to-Gulf waterway system of transportation in connection with the proposed St. Lawrence system which, when in full operation, will bring the agricultural products of the Middle West 1,000 miles closer to tidewater, with a resultant benefit to agriculture approximating 6 to 9 cents per bushel upon its crops.

This fact has already been demonstrated by the barge-line operations in the Middle West which cover rail-river-rail transportation at the present time and which will ultimately develop into complete water transportation from some points and at least rail-river transportation for all points. Even under the present barge-line transportation the saving from Chicago to St. Paul, first class, is 15 cents per hundredweight, or $3 per ton, when shipped by rail to Dubuque and thence by barge. A carload of books from Chicago to Fargo, N. Dak., recently moved by rail-river-rail at a saving of 11 cents per hundredweight, or $2.20 per ton. This system of transportation when completed, as contemplated by the Government, will be an enormous saving to the farmer and will be a wonderful auxiliary assistance to the successful operation of the farm bill now under discussion. The Lakes-to-Gulf waterway will present a satisfactory avenue for water transportation between the great inland waterway systems of the country, the Mississippi and the Great Lakes. It will be adequate for barge traffic not only for present needs but for generations to come. The Illinois portion of the connected waterway passes through the center of one of the most productive sections of the United States, and at its eastern terminus lies the second city of the country, Chicago. Toward the south through the New Orleans gateway exports may be carried by water to all parts of the world, and on the return imports will be able to reach the heart of this great central valley and to the far shores of the Great Lakes.

The Seventieth Congress is certainly to be congratulated in giving birth to such a happy solution of a problem which has occupied the attention of Congress for the last 12 years and which now makes possible the fulfillment of platform and party pledges to the people of the great agricultural States.

EXTENSION OF TIME IN BRIDGE CONSTRUCTION

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, out of order, I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Commerce the bill (S. 1453) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of certain bridges, and for other purposes. The bill is one incorporating the provisions of some seven or eight bridge bills. The bill simply extends the time for the beginning and completion of certain bridges which have heretofore been provided for. This time would expire before the beginning of the next regular session. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered at once.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, what bridges are embraced within the bill?

Mr. JONES. There are four or five in Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I merely wish to say that I am in hearty sympathy with the Senator's request.

Mr. JONES. The second section of the bill relates to an amendment of a bridge act heretofore passed, which is provided for in a bill which has just passed the House of Representatives. I move to amend the bill as reported by striking out section 2.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I would like to know if there is any change in the language of the original bill?

Mr. JONES. There is none.

Mr. COUZENS. It is merely granting an extension of time?

Mr. JONES. That is all.

Mr. COUZENS. I understood there was one of the bridges in Michigan as to which some changes were made, so that the language is different from the original provision. I would like to know about it.

Mr. JONES. That is the one as to which I move to strike out the second section of the bill.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator will substitute some language different from that in the original bill?

Mr. JONES. No; I am proposing to strike from the bill all language relating to that matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from Washington will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] moves to amend the bill by striking out section 2, which proposes to amend section 5 of an act entitled "An act authorizing Maynard D. Smith, his heirs, successors, and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the St. Clair River at or near Port Huron, Mich.," approved March 2, 1929, being Public Act No. 923 of the Seventieth Congress, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., (a) That the times for commencing and completing the construction of the bridge across the Missouri River, between Council Bluffs, Iowa, and Omaha, Nebr., authorized to be built by the city of Council Bluffs, Iowa, and the city of Omaha, Nebr., or either of them, by the act of Congress approved May 24, 1928, are hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from the date of the approval hereof.

(b) That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Ouachita River at or near Calion, Ark., authorized to be built by the State Highway Commission of Arkansas, by the act of Congress approved March 12, 1928, as amended by act approved May 25, 1928, are hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof.

(e) That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the White River at or near Augusta, Ark., authorized to be built by the State Highway Commission of Arkansas by the act of Congress approved May 26, 1928, are hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof.

(f) That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the White River at or near Cotter, Ark., authorized to be built by the State Highway Commission of Arkansas by the act of Congress approved May 1, 1928, are hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof.

(g) That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Shawneetown, Gallatin County, Ill., and a point opposite thereto in Union County, Ky., authorized to be built by the act of Congress entitled "An act authorizing J. L. Rowan, his heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Shawneetown, Ill.," approved May 1, 1928, are hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from May 1, 1929.

(h) That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Detroit River at or near Stony Island, Wayne County, State of Michigan, authorized to be built by the act of Congress entitled "An act authorizing the Detroit River Canadian Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Detroit River at or near Stony Island, Wayne County, State of Michigan," approved May 21, 1928, are hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from May 21, 1929.

SEC. 3 (2). The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 4, after line 4, it is proposed to insert:

That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across Perdido Bay at or near Inerarity Point, in Escambia County, Fla., to the mainland of Baldwin County, Ala., authorized to be built by the act of Congress entitled "An act authorizing the Northwest Florida Corporation, its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across Perdido Bay, at or near Inerarity Point, in Escambia County, Fla., to the mainland of Baldwin County, Ala.," approved May 26, 1928, are hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from May 26, 1929.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Florida if the time for beginning the bridge to which his amendment refers expires before the regular session?

Mr. FLETCHER. It does.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

ST. CLAIR RIVER BRIDGE

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to hand down a message which just came over from the House of Representatives relative to the St. Clair River Bridge.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives.

The bill (H. R. 3600) to amend section 5 of an act entitled "An act authorizing Maynard D. Smith, his heirs, successors, and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the St. Clair River at or near Port Huron, Mich.," approved March 2, 1929, and being Public Act No. 923 of the Seventieth Congress, was read the first time by its title.

Mr. VANDENBERG. This is precisely the same section which was included in the bill just reported by the chairman of the Commerce Committee [Mr. JONES] and stricken out on his motion. It is the same as Senate bill 1347. It is the same as the second section in Senate bill 1453. In this instance the new provision relates to a limitation upon financing the bridge. In the previous bill the recapture clause required that securities upon the bridge should not exceed the cost of the bridge. It now develops that it is impossible to finance upon that basis because no funds can be advanced until the bridge is completed and the amount of the investment ascertained.

Therefore, as an adequate and effectual substitute, the Michigan interests concerned have secured the consent of the Michigan Utilities Commission to pass upon all these securities. The sole purpose of this change is to transfer to the Michigan Public Utilities Commission control over all of this financing. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES. I do not object, as I understand the bill is in exactly the same form as reported from the Commerce Committee.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is entirely correct.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 of an act entitled "An act authorizing Maynard D. Smith, his heirs, successors, and assigns to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the St. Clair River at or near Port Huron, Mich.," approved March 2, 1929, being Public Act No. 923 of the Seventieth Congress, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. The said Maynard D. Smith, his heirs, successors, and assigns, from time to time may issue bonds, notes, debentures, or other evidences of indebtedness and preferred stock in such principal amount or amounts, and may sell or otherwise dispose of the same at such price or prices as shall have been approved by the Michigan Public Utilities Commission in order to provide funds for the acquisition of real estate and other property or any interest therein needed for the construction of such bridge, and its approaches, to provide funds for the construction of such bridge and its approaches, interest during construction, and the costs of financing; and may secure payment of all or any part of said bonds, notes, debentures, or other evidences of indebtedness by mortgage or other lien upon all or any part of said real estate and other property, including said bridge and its approaches and the franchises and rights to operate and maintain the same, together with the tolls therefrom. All or any of said bonds, notes, debentures, or other evidences of indebtedness and shares of preferred stock shall be subject to redemption at any time or from time to time upon such notice and with such premium, if any, as may be provided therein. Not less than two-thirds of all encumbrances or securities other than preferred stock issued against said bridge shall be first-mortgage bonds, and not more than one-third may be debentures. None of said bonds issued against said bridge shall bear interest at a fixed rate in excess of 6½ per cent per annum on the principal amount thereof. None of said debentures issued against said bridge shall bear interest at a fixed rate in excess of 7 per cent per annum on the principal amount thereof. Any preferred stock issued shall be at par, shall represent value, and may be entitled to accumulative dividends at not to exceed 7 per cent per annum."

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INVESTIGATION OF FLOOD-CONTROL PROGRAM

Mr. HAWES submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 88), which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Whereas the flood-control project authorized by the flood control act approved May 15, 1928, is the largest single engineering project ever adopted by the Federal Government; and

Whereas there have arisen controversies over the interpretation of the law and the intent of Congress between citizens of certain areas within the flood-control program and the engineering agencies of the Government designated to carry out this project; and

Whereas there is impending litigation as a result of these controversies to make secure constitutional protection and congressional intent, which forced litigation may delay and retard the completion of the entire flood-control program, such delay presenting a matter of very grave importance, fraught with danger to the citizens of the alluvial valley: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce of the United States Senate be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate the plans and proposed execution of plans for the flood-control program authorized under the flood control act approved May 15, 1928, and to report its findings to the Senate not later than October 1, 1929, if Congress is then in session, and if not, at the opening of the next regular session of Congress, together with its recommendations for legislation necessary to avoid controverted issues and to expedite the carrying out of the flood-control program.

For the purposes of this resolution, the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-first Congress until the final report is submitted, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $5,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

Resolved further, That the Secretary of War, the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, and the Mississippi River Commission are hereby requested to suspend actual construction operations in the controverted areas pending the outcome of the investigation herein authorized.

PROPOSED STATUES ON ARLINGTON MEMORIAL BRIDGE

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. McNARY. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator, but I desire to retain the floor.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask unanimous consent, out of order, to call up Senate Resolution 85, which I submitted on yesterday and which went over for one day because of a defect in the wording. I now desire to modify the resolution by striking out the word "directed" and inserting the word "requested."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution referred to by the Senator from North Carolina, which will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 85) submitted yesterday by Mr. OVERMAN was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Arlington Memorial Bridge Commission be, and it is hereby, directed to take into consideration in the completion of the memorial bridge the placing at the north end of the bridge a heroic figure of Ulysses S. Grant, facing south, and at the south end of the bridge a heroic figure of Robert E. Lee, facing north, and in the center two figures of women clasping hands, representing the North and South, to perpetuate the memorable saying of General Grant, "Let us clasp hands across the bloody chasm"; and any such other figures as the commission may recommend; and to report its findings and recommendations on the practicability of erecting said statues on the bridge, together with the costs of the erection of such figures and the appropriation which will be necessary; and such other recommendations as in its judgment may be proper in carrying into effect this patriotic sentiment; all of which shall be reported to Congress at the next session.

"As we are united in life, and they united in death, let one monument perpetuate their deeds, and one people, forgetful of all asperities, forever hold in grateful remembrance all the stories of that terrible conflict."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to modify the resolution by striking out, after the word "hereby," the word "directed" and inserting the word "requested," so as to read:

And so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be modified as suggested by the Senator from North Carolina. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

PROPAGANDA IN BEHALF OF NATIONAL-ORIGINS CLAUSE

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, there has been a good deal said about the circulation of propaganda in connection with the national-origins provision of the immigration law. In common with many other Senators, I presume, I received this morning a letter marked "Personal" and signed by the American Vigilant Intelligence Federation, of Chicago, Ill., in which an editorial from the Chicago Tribune is reprinted, which this letter says "sets forth in simple terms the fundamental issue underlying the duty involved upon all loyal Americans to support the national-origins provision," and so forth, and which accuses those of us who are trying to carry out the recommendations of the President with belonging to "not wholly assimilated groups which are preoccupied with their own national identity," and so forth. I do not intend to read it or to have it printed in the RECORD, but merely wish to call attention to the kind of propaganda that is being issued, and in particular to the veiled threat at the bottom of this sheet which says:

The roll-call vote on the Nye resolution to discharge the Senate Immigration Committee will be tabulated and widely distributed.

In other words, Mr. President, those of us who wish to carry out the recommendation of the President when he said in his message that the enactment of "certain matters of emergency legislation" would be in the public interest, and included in them "the suspension of the national-origins clause of the immigration act of 1924," those of us who are in favor of that question being considered by the Senate and are opposed to the action of the committee in having it pigeonholed in the committee so that an opportunity to vote on the suspension of this provision may be had in the Senate and debate may be had on such suspension or any amendment to the immigration act are to be held up to scorn by those who are connected with the American Vigilant Intelligence Federation and their friends, who remind us that the "roll-call vote on the Nye resolution to discharge the Senate Immigration Committee will be tabulated and widely distributed." In other words, they say, "If you vote to bring this question out of the committee and onto the floor of the Senate, where it may be debated, amended, and voted upon, you are going to be shown up to your constituents as being un-American and not being willing to carry out the duty devolving upon all loyal Americans," and so forth.

That is the kind of propaganda to which some of us are being subjected, and I protest against those who, when the time comes to vote, shall vote in favor of the resolution to discharge the committee being accused of being disloyal Americans, for rather they should be credited with doing something which the President asked us to do when he called Congress in extra session.

NATIONAL-ORIGINS CLAUSE OF THE IMMIGRATION ACT

Mr. NYE and Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. McNARY. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. NYE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] if there might be any use in endeavoring to reach a unanimous-consent agreement at this time relative to fixing an hour for a vote upon the immigration law resolution?

Mr. REED. Not until the conference report on the farm relief bill shall have been disposed of.

Mr. NYE. Has the Senator from Pennsylvania any intention to-day of speaking upon the national-origins question?

Mr. REED. I do not think there will be any opportunity to do so, Mr. President.

Mr. NYE. Does the Senator from Oregon have in mind temporarily laying aside the unfinished business?

Mr. McNARY. The unfinished business is the resolution of the Senator from North Dakota. I am merely obtruding with the conference report on the farm relief bill.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, then I might suggest——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. McNARY. I have yielded to the Senator from North Dakota. One at a time.

Mr. NYE. I merely desire at this hour to give notice that immediately after the farm bill shall have been disposed of I shall insist upon a vote upon the pending resolution, which is the unfinished business before the Senate. As for my own part, if there be those who plan to remain here, if need be, for an extended summer stay in Washington and swelter through the heat in an endeavor to filibuster against the possible adoption of the resolution, I for one am ready to stay and swelter with them and listen to them.

AMENDMENT TO TARIFF BILL—RAYON DUTIES

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH and Mr. HEFLIN addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. McNARY. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. HEFLIN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon has not yielded for that purpose.

Mr. HEFLIN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator can not suggest the absence of a quorum without the consent of the Senator having the floor. The Senator from Oregon has the floor.

Mr. McNARY. I refuse to yield for that purpose. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. President, out of order, I ask unanimous consent to submit an amendment to House bill 2667, the tariff revision bill. The amendment provides for the insertion at a number of different places in Schedule 13 of words to cover chemical yarns and fabrics which are not generally known as rayon. I ask that the amendment may be printed and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. McNARY. I yield to the Senator, but not for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will make that suggestion just as soon as I get an opportunity.

SELECTION OF CENSUS EMPLOYEES BY CIVIL SERVICE—ADDRESS BY SENATOR WAGNER

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by my colleague, the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], over the radio on Friday evening, June 7, on the subject of the appointment of census employees according to civil-service rules.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

Senator WAGNER spoke as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen, the United States is about to spend $40,000,000 of the taxpayers' money for the greatest and grandest national inventory known to history. We are about to take the Fifteenth Decennial Census of population.

The most important issue before the public in the conduct of that project is whether we shall use that money to buy $40,000,000 worth of information or whether we shall spend it for the purchase of $40,000,000 worth of political patronage for the party presently controlling the administration. We can buy one or the other, but the same money will not buy both.

There is no great mystery in this issue. It is one which the American public has met before and knows how to meet again. It is but a new chapter in the old conflict between the merit system and the spoils system.

The facts are, briefly, these: Every 10 years, as required by the Constitution, we take a census of our entire population and incidentally secure a great quantity of useful information. To take the 1930 census will require the services of 100,000 employees. How do we desire these 100,000 people to be appointed? There are two available methods. The first method is to have these 100,000 jobs filled by men selected by the politicians of the party in power. Men so chosen are appointed for political reasons and not because they exhibit any fitness for the work to be done. All of the appointees are under obligation to the political leaders who secure their employment. That sense of obligation breeds partisanship in the taking of the census and partiality in favor of the party to which the employee owes his appointment. Incompetence, extravagance, and demoralization are bound to follow. That is the old method of hiring Government employees—the old spoils system that we and every other civilized government have long rejected and discarded. That is the method which the majority of the House of Representatives preferred when it voted to strike out the civil-service amendment from the census bill. Should the view of the House prevail, that is the method that will be employed in the next census and in all future censuses until a more enlightened Congress shall change the law.

What is the other method—the one that I am urging the Congress to adopt in place of the discredited spoils system? My proposal, to which the United States Senate has already agreed, is that we select and hire these 100,000 employees by the same methods that we use in hiring the bulk of the rest of the Government employees. I propose that we permit the Civil Service Commission to provide these employees in accordance with the merit system. That gives every person an equal opportunity to secure the job without political favor, and without placing himself under obligation to a politician. The only requirement is that he convince the Civil Service Commission that he has the ability to do the work as required by law.

If this proposal is written into law it will eliminate at one stroke patronage and politics from the census. Supervisors, special agents, clerks, and enumerators will be selected, because they have the capacity to do the work assigned to them. It follows that the results of such a census will be free of bias and partisanship and free of extravagance and waste.

For 50 years we have been developing and perfecting our civil-service system, until it is now part of the bone and marrow of our Government. Every year the Civil Service Commission fills thousands of positions of every class in the Government service. It has the experience and the machinery to hire the men and women required to take the census of population. There is to my mind no valid reason why, at this late date, a national census should be diverted from its lofty constitutional purpose and turned into a carnival of patronage.

The fathers of our Government believed the census of population to be of such vital importance that they made explicit provision for it in the Federal Constitution. The intention of the framers of the Constitution was to create a representative democracy and to establish that representation shall depend upon population. On the census of population are dependent how many Congressmen each State shall elect and how many electoral votes it shall have in choosing a President. Upon the accuracy and honesty of the census, therefore, depend the truth and validity of our representative form of Government.

If you are unwilling that the $40,000,000 made available in this bill be used to pay for party services; if you are concerned that your State secure honest representation in Congress; if you desire your State to obtain its fair proportion of the electoral votes, your only course is to join in the demand that Congress restore the civil service amendment to the census bill. Otherwise, you may expect an incompetent, extravagant, and suspected enumeration—yes, even a fraudulent enumeration.

Am I exaggerating the evil effect of a partisan census? Let me read you a page out of history:

In 1890 we had a political census. The Director of the Census, instead of devoting himself to the duties of his office, became the grand dispenser of patronage. He kept a great ledger of over 400 pages in which he entered how many appointments were charged to each Congressman and the salary value of each job. In this way he could tell at a glance whether a Congressman had overdrawn his account or whether there was a balance of appointments at his disposal.

In New York City the supervisor sent out letters reading as follows:

"DEAR SIR: You will please forward to this office a list of the applicants that the Republican organization in your district desires to have named as enumerators."

This letter was sent although the law provided that enumerators be appointed without regard to political affiliation. Naturally, many people were suspicious of the results. Very few had faith in the accuracy or honesty of the count. In New York City a recount was conducted which showed that over 200,000 names, or fully a sixth of the population at that time, had been omitted from the rolls. Why? In order to prevent the city of New York from sending an additional Representative to the Congress.

In 1900 we had another political census. In some of the counties of the State of Maryland the party leaders were interested, for political reasons, in showing an increase in population. What did they do? The politically appointed supervisors instructed the politically appointed enumerators to secure all the names they could and where they could not secure them honestly to use their imaginations. The Federal grand jury investigated the results of that enumeration and found that the enumerators had canvassed the cemeteries and had deciphered the names engraved upon the tombstones generations before. They had canvassed summer hotels and taken the name of every tourist who had spent a day in the country. On the census rolls appeared the name of a woman who had died before the enumeration and also the name of the undertaker who had come from a distant city to bury her. The grand jury summed up its conclusions by saying:

"So long as such appointments are treated as part of the spoils of politics the recurrence of such frauds and scandals as have been revealed by our investigation may be expected."

That warning has not deterred the majority of the House of Representatives. It insists that once again these census appointments shall become part of the spoils of politics.

During the debate upon the bill it was revealed that even before its passage detailed agreements were already made to divide the 100,000 jobs among the deserving without unseemly squabbles.

In 1909 when Congress sent to President Roosevelt a census bill providing for the spoils system he vetoed it. Information was brought to him that to silence opposition the politicians had agreed to distribute some of the jobs between both parties. With characteristic vigor that great President said in his veto message:

"I do not believe in the doctrine that to the victor belong the spoils; but I think even less of the doctrine that the spoils shall be divided without a fight by the professional politicians on both sides; and this would be the result of permitting the bill in its present shape to become a law. Both of the last censuses, the Eleventh and the Twelfth, were taken under a provision of law excluding competition; that is, necessitating the appointments being made under the spoils system. Every man competent to speak with authority because of his knowledge of and familiarity with the work of those censuses has stated that the result was to produce extravagance and demoralization."

The objection has been raised that the Civil Service Commission will not be able to find the necessary number of employees. No one has explained why it should have any difficulty. If the politicians can do it, why can not the Civil Service Commission? In fact, the commission already has upon its lists 60,000 names of persons eligible for appointment and 4,000 boards throughout the country to secure as many more as the Government may require.

Great emphasis has been laid by the opponents of the civil service amendment that the census employees are temporary. What if many of them are? Does that justify a partisan and political census? Furthermore, a substantial number of the employees, particularly the special agents, can, under the law, be employed for long periods of time to gather all sorts of statistics and information. There is no legal limitation upon the term of their employment.

The Civil Service Commission has officially stated that it is able and willing to find 100,000 capable persons to take the census. Numerous public-spirited organizations have taken official action in favor of the civil-service amendment. The majority of the press is supporting it. I can see no valid objection against it.

The truth is that those who are opposed to this amendment believe that to the victor belong the spoils. They look upon the 100,000 jobs as a great and rich opportunity for the party in power to declare a dividend for the benefit of those who helped and are going to help to elect its candidate to office. That reasoning, I am sure, has no appeal to the 120,000,000 of people whose sole interest is that the census be honestly and efficiently accomplished.

When an administration has the opportunity to choose between a census taken by partisan or nonpartisan agencies and it chooses to have the census taken exclusively by the political appointees of its own party, then in the minds of all fair-minded people is planted a suspicion against the integrity of the enumeration. Such a result is intolerable. Following the leadership of Theodore Roosevelt, I would rather have no census at all than be a party to one that was under suspicion from the day of its inception.

"THE SAN JUAN DISPUTE"

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I have a short historical statement of the thrilling struggle by which the San Juan Islands were made and kept a part of the United States, and I am going to ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD, because it recites a tale that is seldom told in history. The story of the bravery and daring of Colonel Pickett—I think he was a colonel at the time—who later led Pickett's charge at Gettysburg and who saved these islands to the United States, is so interesting that I think it might well be placed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SAN JUAN DISPUTE—A THRILLING PERIOD IN UNITED STATES HISTORY—1852–1872

The San Juan dispute forms an interesting chapter in the history of northwest Washington and is worthy of more than passing comment. The story of English camp, which is situated on Garrison Bay, on the northern end of San Juan Island, is full of romance and carries us back to the days of pioneer life.

Up to the date of the signing of the Webster-Ashburton treaty in 1842 which defined the boundary between the American and British possessions in the Northwest as the forty-ninth parallel of latitude, Great Britain had laid claim to all the country at least as far south as the Columbia River, and through the weakness of a vacillating policy at Washington and the privileges of a so-called joint occupancy she had been practically mistress of the vast territory that was then all called Oregon.

When, on the conclusion of the treaty of 1842, the great Hudson Bay Co. were compelled to furl their banners, forsake their great stockaded posts, abandon their enormous fur trade, and withdraw within the boundaries of British Columbia, it was sullenly, wrathfully, revengefully they went. They were in no temper to yield one further foot of land that by any loophole of construction might be still claimed as British soil.

Now, although the treaty had defined the boundary line it was in one detail most clumsily expressed. It proposed that the line after following the forty-ninth parallel of latitude to the Gulf of Georgia should then run along the middle of the channel which separates the continent from Vancouver Island and through the middle of the Straits of Juan de Fuca to the Pacific Ocean. But between the continent and Vancouver Island there is a group of islands, the most important of which is San Juan, and there are not one but three channels to the Straits of Fuca. One, the Haro Channel, the largest, most naturally followed and the one undoubtedly intended by the treaty, as was later definitely determined, ran to the west of San Juan. This the United States claimed as the boundary and San Juan as within her exclusive possession. The second, the Rosario Channel, ran to the east of the archipelago, and Great Britain claimed this as the boundary, which would give her San Juan, Lopez, and all the other islands in the group. That she had no faith in the justice of this claim, however, was shown by her alternative proposition that the "treaty channel" was that called the President, a tortuous, obscure waterway threading its way through the midst of the archipelago, but still leaving San Juan on the British side of the line.

In 1852, however, the young Washington Territory had a legislature composed of men who thoroughly understood their own minds and were not apt to be slow or doubtful in claiming their rights, and this legislature calmly settled the matter so far as they were concerned—and perhaps partly as a spur to the easy-going gentlemen at Washington—by incorporating San Juan as part of Island County. There being no settlers on the island at the time, either British or American, no assessment was made until 1854, in which year the island was placed by the legislature in the boundaries of the newly formed county of Whatcom. But the act was an assertion of American ownership that quickly was taken advantage of and made real by resolute men.

Undoubtedly the British Government was alarmed and irritated by this step, and determined to make a move, if possible, to bolster up its own fraudulent claim of ownership. As usual, it looked to the Hudson Bay Co. to act as its agent in carrying out this purpose, and never had it found that great advance guard of its interests more willing and eager. To baffle the Americans who had driven it from its rich holdings in Oregon was but the desire of its heart.

In December of 1853 the Hudson Bay Co.'s steamer Beaver left Victoria with 1,300 sheep, which it proceeded to land on San Juan with the herders in charge of one of their agents named Charles J. Griffin, who long played an important part upon the island.

Early in 1854 the news of this came to the ears of I. N. Ebey, the United States collector of customs for Puget Sound, a man with wide-open eyes and a determined American. He cared nothing about the sheep, but he cared everything that the United States should yield no color or shadow of right to the British claim through neglect or acquiescence.

In March, 1854, he took with him one Henry Webber, a man of his own caliber, and suddenly appeared on San Juan, where he sent for Griffin to come before him. When that gentleman appeared Ebey informed him that he was a United States customs collector, that the sheep upon the island seemed to have carelessly strayed around the customhouse instead of through it, and that he had come to examine into the matter. Griffin demurred to his authority, protesting against his presence and requested his departure. Mr. Ebey reasserted his authority, ignored the protest, and politely refused the request.

While the discussion was still in progress and was approaching an uncomfortable degree of heat, new actors appeared upon the scene. The Hudson Bay Co. had heard of Ebey's departure for San Juan, and now there swiftly approached the beach the company's steamer Otter, bearing His Excellency the British Governor Douglas, of Vancouver, and Vice Collector of Her Majesty's Customs Sangster. As a boat was lowered from the steamer and approached the beach, Ebey showed his quick wit by rushing off one of his men to plant an American flag which he had brought with him on a near-by hill, thus making the Stars and Stripes the first of any nation to fly over the disputed territory. As the boat approaching carried a British flag which they had destined to that very honor, the sight failed to improve the temper of the occupants.

Vice Collector Sangster approached Mr. Ebey and curtly demanded what he was doing upon San Juan. Ebey replied that he was there to do his duty in a part of the customs district of Puget Sound of which he was collector under the United States Government. Sangster, in a towering rage, declared that he would not only arrest him but all other Americans found on the island, and that he would even seize any American vessel found navigating any waters west of the Rosario Channel. This bluff seeming to impress Mr. Ebey in not the slightest degree, and he refusing an invitation to go on board the Otter for the distinguished honor of a conference with Governor Douglas, the Otter finally steamed away, leaving Mr. Sangster with a constable and a boat's crew to deal with the stubborn and recalcitrant American.

Ebey could not remain on the island indefinitely, but he saw that this was no time to withdraw any authority, so he appointed Henry Webber an inspector of customs, in spite of Sangster's threats to arrest Webber and take him to Victoria for trial. The next morning at sunrise Webber was awakened by Griffin, who solemnly informed him that he was under arrest. Mr. Webber laughed at him good-naturedly and demanded to see his warrant. Griffin not having such an article, retired, but a few hours later the constable appeared with an amazing document which purported to be a warrant for Webber's arrest, drawn by Griffin himself, acting as a Hudson Bay Co. magistrate.

The constable had his boat's crew with him and demanded Mr. Webber's immediate company. But by this time that gentleman's patience had evaporated, and he gave his visitors a rude shock by producing one of the cannonlike revolvers of those days and remarked that it contained six allopathic doses of lead, all of which he proposed to administer if his guests did not immediately remove themselves from his vicinity. The constable promptly stepped out of range and commanded his crew to seize the prisoner, which they as promptly declined to do. There was an attempt at further parley which Mr. Webber cut short with a further convincing demonstration with his artillery, and the arresting party retired to appear later with a peace offering of a choice leg of mutton and a proposition for an indefinite armistice, which Webber graciously acceded to. A few months later a sheriff of Whatcom County appeared upon the scene and seized and sold some 30 of the Hudson Bay Co.'s sheep for unpaid taxes under the assessment of that year, and thus for the time ended triumphantly the American assertion of authority over the island of San Juan.

Everything remained in this peaceful and satisfactory condition until 1859, except for frequent resignations and changes among the customs inspectors on the island because of the loneliness of the post and the occasional Indian incursions, against which they were almost entirely unprotected.

In the winter of 1859, however, an incident absurdly trivial in its inception fanned the smoldering embers into a blaze which nearly lighted the torch of war between two great nations. In that year there were 29 actual American settlers on the island and the taxes to be collected by the county amounted to $935. The island had grown to be considered indubitably America. A Hudson Bay officer named Dallas had roaming about the island a hog that he claimed to be of pure blood imported stock that had a fondness for rooting down the fences of the American settlers who were wont to speak of him as an unspeakable, common, old razor-backed shoat. One of these settlers, in a fit of wrath over the loss of a promising collection of "garden truck" shot the brute. In a few days Dallas appeared upon the scene, and though Cutler agreed to pay for the animal killed, refused the offer and insisted that Cutler should be arrested and taken to Victoria for trial. Cutler was no more moved by such a bold threat than Ebey and Webber had been and the warrant, if one existed, was never served; but the Americans, not only on San Juan, but in Victoria, were roused to the highest pitch of wrath at the thought of a United States citizen being arrested on American soil and taken to a British port to await a British trial.

They drew up a memorial reciting the facts of the attempted outrage and asked the protection of United States troops against its renewal or any attempt at a like prosecution on the part of the British authorities, and forwarded it to General Harney, then in command of the Department of the Pacific. No better man could have been found to have had this matter on his hands at this time. To throw American troops into San Juan was a step from which a timid man would certainly have shrunk. It was sure to arouse the jealous antagonism of Great Britain, and British ships and troops in that immediate vicinity outnumbered all that the United States could possibly have opposed to them beyond all comparison. But General Harney was not a man who was given to close calculation of odds where honor was at stake. The very year before he had been in Utah against the Mormons, and when just as winter was coming on he was surrounded by immensly superior forces and implored to withdraw before he should be cut to pieces, he had replied: "Gentlemen, I have orders to winter in Utah and I am going to winter there or in hell."

He responded promptly to the appeal of settlers by sending to San Juan, with orders to stay there and hold the island, a company of the Ninth United States Infantry, under the command of G. E. Pickett, whose temper at that time was no less courageous and ignorant of the hesitation of fear than when he led the immortal charge of his brigades to the Confederate high-water mark at Gettysburg.

Pickett, with his little command, landed on San Juan in July, and on the same day the British man-of-war Satellite appeared off the island and landed Major De Courcy as a stipendary magistrate, a step that had clearly the object of granting British processes against settlers who were wholly American. Griffin again came to the front and threatened Captain Pickett himself with arrest under the guns of the British fleet, but this time met with a reception more vigorous than considerate. This final rebuff seems to have done Griffin, for hereafter we hear no more of his threats and bluster, but on the contrary his house seems to have become a hospitable rendezvous for years for British and American officers alike.

But more exciting days were at hand. Pickett's company of 60 men all told had barely settled into their camp on the island before there appeared off the shore and broadside to their tents the British men-of-war Tribune, of 31 guns and 325 men, and Satellite, of 21 guns and 125 men. Pickett sent a message to Steilacoom, where there was a United States post, and the dilapidated old Navy tub Massachusetts, with 3 guns fit for service and a speed of about 6 knots an hour.

Before she could more than get started for San Juan the British ship captains announced to Captain Pickett that they would immediately proceed to land a force of 500 men. Pickett, in the face of their numbers, the batteries of their ships, and the knowledge that the British ship of the line Ganges, with 84 guns and 840 men, was on her way to join the British forces, returned the reply that he and his men would fight to the last drop of blood in them before a British soldier should set foot ashore on the island.

On the receipt of this astonishing defiance, Captain Thornby, of the Tribune, sent a message to Pickett asking him to come on board his ship for a conference, but Pickett replied that such a meeting must take place in his tent or not at all. This almost arrogant exhibition of determination seems to have puzzled the British officers and made them wonder what could lie behind it, for they made no move, and on August 10 the Massachusetts lumbered into the harbor and landed Lieutenant Colonel Casey with nine companies of reduced ranks and eight 32-pound cannon.

Governor Douglas now issued a sounding proclamation formally claiming everything in the archipelago and surrounding waters for Great Britain. The situation was critical, indeed, for even with the reinforcements under Lieutenant Colonel Casey, the Americans were desperately outnumbered, and the British ships with their 68-pound guns could remain far outside the range of the American 32s and batter them to pieces or land their guns and have the little army of some 600 Americans at their mercy.

But Pickett's magnificent daring and "bluff" had saved the day. Both countries were awakened to the fatal proximity of another war, and when General Harney answered Governor Douglas's proclamation with a ringing letter that he had posted his soldiers on American soil to protect, and that British aggression must cease, old Gen. Winfield Scott hastened to the scene to meet the British admiral, Bayne, and in a few days the two old warriors reached the extraordinary agreement with reference to which this article begun.

Near Roche Harbor 100 men of the British Royal Marine Light Infantry were landed, hoisted their flag, built their blockhouse and comfortable quarters, and settled down to await events. Not many miles south of them precisely 100 American soldiers built their barracks and fortifications under the folds of Old Glory.

The greatest civil war of history muttered, broke into the roar of a devastating whirlwind and died away; Prussia thrust Austria from the map of northern Europe; Italy, after her centuries of political death, was gloriously resurrected; the most splendid, glittering, hallowed empire in the world was forever shattered at Sedan, and a great republic rose from the blood-soaked ashes of the commune; and still those 100 officers and men, under the Stars and Stripes and the 100 under the cross of St. George held their lonely posts in that far-off island of the lonely Northwest.

And when in 1872 old Emperor William of Germany decided, as sole arbitrator, that the Haro Channel was the boundary and that all the islands were American, the Yankee bands played out of camp the British force, which left without a murmur of rancor or hostility.

The property on which the English camp is located was homesteaded by William Crook, and still remains in the hands of the heirs of the family.

To mark the two camps so that their location will never be lost to history, the Washington Historical Society has erected monuments inscribed with words that briefly tell the above story.

MUNICIPAL OWNERSHIP OF PUBLIC UTILITIES—ADDRESS BY JOSEPH F. NICHOLS

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by Mr. Joseph F. Nichols, of Greenville, Tex., on the municipal ownership of public utilities, before the 1929 convention of the League of Texas Municipalities.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Mr. Chairman and members of the 1929 convention of the League of Texas Municipalities, I am assigned the subject of Municipal Ownership of Local Public Utilities, which, during these times, is becoming one of the paramount propositions now before the people of this Nation.

Municipal ownership has been decried by politicians, by groups of people owning or seeking to own the right to operate local utilities, and their paid propaganda. For a number of years municipal ownership has been discredited among the people because of this persistent adverse propaganda, and because of local politics and inefficient maintenance and operation.

During preceding 10 years city government, as a governmental and business institution, has itself improved and continues to improve. Under the most recent system of city managership plan city governmental institutions have grown to be very competent and efficient, to the end that a modern city under city managership is conducted and operated as well as any extensive, well-organized, efficient, successful business enterprise.

This efficient development and operation of city government includes the maintenance and operation of local public utilities by such municipalities, so that it is no longer a question for debate whether a municipality can successfully and efficiently maintain and operate a local public utility. It is now a proven and accepted fact that a city can as successfully and efficiently maintain and operate a local public utility as does the most efficient private ownership. Therefore, it is no longer proper and necessary to submit an argument to show that a city can maintain and operate a municipal public utility plant.

MUNICIPAL OWNERSHIP NECESSARY

Private municipal electric light and power, gas, water, and telephone companies as a rule are now burdened by numerous holding companies. For the officers, maintenance, and service of these holding companies the producing utility company must pay considerable sums as operating expense together with the legitimate and necessary capital, maintenance, and operating expense, and reasonable profit on its own investment. The consumer of the service of such producing utility must pay a rate composed of what would be reasonable and just for the producing utility rendering him the service, and added charges to contribute to the service and needs of the holding companies to which the producing utility belongs or is a part.

State regulatory commissions have been unable to protect the consumer against such an unnecessary and unjust rate, as the courts have held that the relation of the holding companies to the producing utility is contractual, and unless there is a direct showing of collusion or fraud, a regulatory commission can not inquire into or amend or annul any such contracts.

The municipal plants are not burdened by such holding companies and are not compelled to pay tribute to the service and needs of such holding companies. The municipal plants are producing utilities, with the rates based on the usual low capital expenditures for installation, extension, and operating expenses. For this reason a municipal utility plant can and does operate at a lower service rate than the modern privately owned utility which can not compete with a municipal utility in rates, and can not operate on as low rate as a municipal utility. This is a fact that is being proven in Texas to-day and in other cities in the United States which enjoy municipal ownership.

The utility consumer should be compelled to pay only a reasonable rate for the economical installation, maintenance, operation, and profit of the producing utility actually rendering service to him, as which can and is rendered him by a municipal utility. Under modern conditions, combinations, and intercompany relations a privately owned producing utility can not render him the service at this just and reasonable rate. For benefit of the consumer and for his protection, and to save him from paying more than he should pay, the municipal-owned utility is not only proper but very necessary, saving the consumer in rates and protecting him from being compelled to contribute to the support of the useless and unnecessary numerous holding companies and intercompany relations, "which toil not, neither do they spin"; yet none gather in such income as does any of them.

THE POWER TRUST AND ITS MASTER

There is existing in the United States to-day an extensive and formidable combination of electric light and power interests which is inimical to the continued prosperity and general welfare of this Nation, which tremendous electric light and power combination is known as the Power Trust.

Facts are being shown, through the Federal Trade Commission investigation, that during 1925 there existed 20 major electric power groups in the United States controlling at least four-fifths of the electric power in this country, and each of these groups control one or more minor groups, which in turn control electric light and power production plants. These combinations and intercorporate relations form pyramids predicated on a producing company, all companies above the production company being holding companies or their subsidiaries. These holding companies generally own the stocks and bonds of the producing companies, and own stock among each other, and their relations with the producing company are contractual.

The Power Trust with its affiliated groups has worked well and long to capture and hold the American people, to bind the electric light and power consumers to pay tribute to this mighty octopus and to contribute amply to defray the stupendous expense of the superholding interests to pay good dividends to the splendid, well bred, cultured aristocracy who conceived this great graft scheme, and thus seek to enslave the American electric consumer and compel his sweat and toil to produce for them.

The evidence is showing that these power groups with other affiliated corporate utility interests have and are expending millions of dollars annually in purchasing newspapers and book publishing concerns, or acquiring interests in same, and in subsidizing the press generally by paid advertising matter to the extent that the press generally has been silent as to the dangerous inroads being made by these power interests in the United States. The evidence shows that the press generally has and does signally fail in its great office and public duty to warn the American people of the stupendous and most dangerous menace confronting the Nation. Large sums of money have been and are being spent in subsidizing colleges and schools and in preparation of textbooks that are written and published in their interest and taught in our schools and colleges, and in paying salaries of educators and expenses of educators to conventions and for travel.

Influential men and women have been, and, no doubt are now, on the Power Trust pay roll, including leaders of civic organizations, business clubs, and woman's organizations. Forsooth, there seems to be no influential organization affording opportunity for the power propaganda that did not or could not receive generous sums from the Power Trust interests. With all the moneys paid in extravagant sums to newspapers, lecturers, textbooks, and educators, with all their propaganda from every source, the Power Trust, reckoned yet without its master, the American people. For the American people through and by Government ownership and operation of electric power and light utilities, including municipal ownership, are saving and can save themselves and will defeat the deep-laid plans of the Power Trust.

State regulatory commissions have proven inadequate to control and to regulate the electric power interests because of the tremendous far-reaching and intercorporate relations, holding companies, and combinations of the power groups: and Government and municipal ownerships are the only recognized potent agencies left and available to protect the people, which agencies the power interests seek by every means to circumvent and to destroy. Government and municipal ownerships are the Verdun to the battle fronts of the armies of the Power Trust, and as long as the Government and municipal ownership lines are not weakened or destroyed, the onward march of the Power Trust forces at Verdun "shall not pass" and will not pass.

Municipal ownership of local public utilities is recognized to-day as not only practicable and proper but protects the people from the exorbitant rates by the power groups, and as the only available means of circumventing the rapacity and greed of the Power Trust, and to be sure and certain defenders and protectors of the best interests and welfare of the people.

During the 1929 Legislature of the State of Texas, the Power Trust sought to obtain legislation to destroy, hamper, or prevent municipal ownership. These interests had purchased, largely at extravagant prices, the great majority of the plants in Texas, leaving only a small comparative number of municipally owned plants that had not been taken over by them. Hence, if the power interest could destroy, curtail, or seriously hamper, any right of any municipality to install and operate a municipal plant in competition with the power group plant, the conquest of Texas would be most complete. But their effort failed in the legislature, and before another legislature convenes, though the press generally remains silent, the people through other means will be better informed as to the situation and will see to it that only safe patriotic men be returned to the legislature, to Congress, and to the governor's office.

Gov. Dan Moody, of Texas, has been impressed with the vast control, danger, and intrigue of the Power Trust, and sought to remedy the existing danger through a State regulatory commission, which preserved and protected the right of cities to own and operate local utility plants. In this proposed legislation the power interests at all times sought to destroy, restrain, and to hamper municipal ownership and to insert in such legislation provisions having such effect.

MUNICIPAL OWNERSHIP LEGISLATION

The Legislature of Texas should enact laws promoting and extending the operation of municipal utility plants, so that a group of cities, towns, and villages may enter into interurban group contracts providing for the location and operation of a central power and distributing plant extending service to and for the urban communities in the group or zone. Such a plan as this will be adaptable for electric light and power, in some instances for water, and in due course of time for gas for fuel purposes. Such a plan is being discussed in the progressive State of Wisconsin. In the electrical field, this plan has proven successful in the big publicly owned electric light and power plant in Ontario, Canada.

Legislation should be had that when a local utility rate is fixed by the municipal government no utility, municipal or privately owned plant, shall prescribe or collect any lower rate than such rate. This will prevent a privately owned plant competing with a municipal plant, reducing its rates below the municipal rate with the intent to destroy the municipal plant, as was done by the Texas power and light plants at Terrell and Garland, Tex, when the rates were placed far below cost of rendering the service in these two cities. Where such is done by a competing privately owned plant, the law should compel a like reduction by it in every other city and town in the State where it is rendering local service.

MUNICIPAL OWNERSHIP GROWING

During the past two years in Texas the municipally owned and operated utility plants—especially electric light and power—have proven their worth to the cities and towns operating them and their superiority in service and rates over the Power Trust plants, and public sentiment is growing to favor such utilities, and the number of such utilities is increasing.

The municipal electric plants in the large cities of Cleveland, Springfield, Los Angeles, and Seattle have shown that not only such big units can be successfully maintained and operated by large cities at low rates, but such plants render other extensive city service at no or little cost, which the privately owned plant can not do.

Los Angeles, Calif., is giving to the country the best and most impressive lesson in municipal ownership, especially as to electric light and power, in its successful maintenance and operation of one of the large electric light and power plants in the United States. Through and by reason of the Los Angeles municipal electric plant reasonable and just rates are maintained, industrial and commercial progress and development of Los Angeles is being had, and there is encouragement and development of private enterprise in many other lines of industrial and business endeavor. There is developed and exists in the Los Angeles citizenship a splendid civic pride in the city, its institutions, and industrial and business enterprises, which has been created by and through this successful ownership and operation of local utilities by the city of Los Angeles.

What has been done and what is being done by and in the great city of Los Angeles, Calif., can and will be done by and in any other city and town in the United States, be it a large city or a small town. For there are many small towns in the United States which have also shown a most successful and pleasing result in their operation and ownership of their local utilities, including light and power plants.

REHABILITATION OF FARM LANDS IN FLOOD-DEVASTATED AREAS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 3548) to continue, during the fiscal year 1930, Federal aid in rehabilitating farm lands in the areas devastated by floods in 1927, which was read twice by its title.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, this is an important bill for those who live in the region along the Mississippi River where great flood devastation occurred two or three years ago. The bill passed the House yesterday; a similar bill passed the Senate a few days ago, and rather than have the House bill go to the calendar, which would cause a delay, I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

If I may say just a word further, the bill does not appropriate any additional funds but continues the appropriation made heretofore by Congress to assist those States and counties in paying county agents where the States are unable to pay on account of the devastation wrought by the flood.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any unexpended balance of the appropriation to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the act entitled "An act for the purpose of rehabilitating farm lands in the flood areas," approved January 26, 1928, contained in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes," approved May 16, 1928, is hereby reappropriated, and shall remain available for the same purposes during the fiscal year 1930.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FARM RELIEF—CONFERENCE REPORT

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1) to establish a Federal farm board to promote the effective merchandising of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce, and to place agriculture on a basis of economic equality with other industries. The question is on agreeing to the report.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, as a matter of history, the Senate and the House conferees met in conference on Monday, May 20, and continued with slight interruptions until Thursday, June 6. During the first week of the conference the House conferees refused to have the bill read or to discuss any of the provisions of the bill until the Senate conferees should agree to recede from the debenture proposal. For five days that situation obtained, and the conference adjourned temporarily. After the lapse of that period the conferees reassembled and continued their labors. During the latter part of the conference, which occupied nearly three weeks, the House and Senate conferees agreed upon every provision which was in disagreement between the two bodies, except the debenture plan.

The House conferees insisted that the Senate in adopting the debenture provision trenched upon its prerogatives; that the provision was a revenue-raising plan and, under the Constitution, should originate in the House of Representatives. They also stated that the House had expressed itself when it voted for the rule to send the bill to conference, and by that vote, a 2 to 1 vote, the House conferees insisted that the other body had spoken in disapproval of the debenture plan.

As a third argument the House conferees insisted that if they should agree to the debenture provision and the bill should pass both Houses of Congress by the adoption of a conference report containing the debenture plan the President would veto the measure because of the 10 reasons he cited in the letter he wrote in April to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The Senate conferees did not attach great importance to any of the three reasons advanced by the House conferees. We argued at length that in no wise did the attitude of the Senate impinge upon their constitutional prerogatives. We said that the question of whether or not the President would veto the bill was a question that rested with the President, and a difference of opinion might exist among men having the same advantage respecting the mind and opinion of the President.

It was urged by the Senate conferees with emphasis that the House had not directly expressed itself on the debenture proposal; that we could not construe the vote upon the rule as a free and frank expression upon the debenture proposal. We pleaded very earnestly with the House conferees to take the bill back to the House and get a vote on the debenture plan. The House conferees seemed to be and were, in fact, adamant. We got nowhere. After five days an impasse ensued; hence, the retirement of the House conferees from the conference.

Mr. President, referring again to their return to the conference, the debenture plan was not discussed for several days. The whole time of the conferees was spent in attempting to come to an agreement on the matters as to which the Houses were in disagreement. On the last day of the consideration of the bill, when an agreement had been reached on all other provisions, again the debate recurred upon the debenture proposal. To the majority of the Senate conferees the House managers made it plain, indeed, in their judgment, that they would not recede from their opposition to the debenture plan. As chairman of the conference, I stated on several occasions that I felt a great responsibility would be removed from the shoulders of the chairman of the committee, and probably all of the Senate conferees, if the House would express itself upon the debenture. I realized then, as I do now, that in this particular conference the majority of the Senate conferees assumed and were forced to assume a very large responsibility.

I regret exceedingly that the House conferees did not comply with our request; but a time came in the discussion of this problem of nearly three weeks, in the judgment of the chairman of the Senate conferees, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], when further insistence would merely result in further delay; further persistence on the part of the conferees would probably destroy the opportunity for legislation at this extra session of the Congress. Probably we acted prematurely; our judgment may be challenged; but the majority of the conferees conscientiously believed it was useless further to insist on the House conferees taking the bill back and getting a vote upon the proposal.

The majority of the Senate conferees agreed to recede from the debenture provision of the bill. The distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] with equal fervor and zealousness held that we should further insist upon the House expressing itself on the debenture plan.

That, in brief, I think accurately describes the situation in conference, how the debenture plan was finally abandoned, and the reasons for the recession.

I felt, Mr. President, and I feel now, that no rights of the Senate were lost, none of its prerogatives sacrificed, by the action of the majority of the conferees. The report brings back the bill without the debenture. A vote for the report sends the bill to the White House. A vote against the report would send it back to conference with instructions further to insist upon the inclusion of the debenture plan. Consequently, nothing that the majority of the conferees have done has in any way imperiled this legislation. Indeed, I think it has hastened it, if the majority of this body desire early legislation in the field of farm relief.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McNARY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator, as chairman of the conference, whether there was at any time any discussion or conference between the Senate conferees and the House conferees over the merits or demerits of the debenture plan?

Mr. McNARY. Yes, Mr. President; but not at great length. The parliamentary situation was the one that occupied the time of the conferees.

Mr. HARRISON. That is what I understood the Senator to say; but I was just wondering if the conferees ever got down to a discussion of the merits or demerits of the debenture plan.

Mr. McNARY. I will say frankly to the Senator from Mississippi, not in a way that would thoroughly develop the merits or demerits of the plan.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. McNARY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH. I do not want the impression to be made even in any degree that the merits or demerits of the debenture were discussed at all in the committee. The attitude of the conferees on the part of the House was that they were not going to continue as a conference if we even considered the House voting on it; and they themselves at no time, so far as I can recall, even discussed the merits or demerits of the debenture as related to this legislation. They laid down their ultimatum, and carried it out to the letter.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, that is an accurate statement of the situation. I think probably, and, in fact, I know, that on several occasions in the conference the Senator from South Carolina spoke enthusiastically of the debenture plan and what it would accomplish, in his opinion.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon further yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. McNARY. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. SMITH. It was a mere casual statement as to my estimate of the debenture plan without referring to a single paragraph in it. I think other Members of the Senate, even some of those who voted against it, expressed the idea that it would be helpful; but the particular features of the debenture were never discussed.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the Senator has made the situation clear. There is no difference, as we look upon the picture, between the two of us. I was going to add, if the Senator had not seen fit to make the statement in advance, that there was not a wide general discussion. There was a discussion, in reply to the statements made by the Senator from South Carolina, by some of the House Members, in which they spoke very disparagingly of the debenture proposition.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. McNARY. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Was it the position of the House conferees that the insertion of the debenture provision was a usurpation of the exclusive powers of the House?

Mr. McNARY. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And therefore that the House conferees would not consider the debenture plan in conference?

Mr. McNARY. That is true.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. So that, as a matter of fact, it has had no consideration in the conference?

Mr. McNARY. They very stoutly insisted on that position.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. McNARY. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. SMITH. I presume the chairman of the committee will give the facts as they developed. That was only one of the objections they had to carrying it back to the House.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I stated originally the three grounds upon which they insisted, and I hope that has been made clear. If it has not been, the Senator in his own time may have an opportunity to restate it in much better fashion.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. McNARY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I understood the Senator to say in his opening remarks that there was a time, some four or five days, during which the House conferees refused to discuss any feature of the bill because the debenture proposition was in it.

Mr. McNARY. Yes; that is true.

Mr. BORAH. How long was that position held by the House conferees?

Mr. McNARY. To be precise, from Monday, May 20, continuing until Saturday of that week, with the exception of Thursday, when the House conferees could not meet with us—practically five days.

Mr. BORAH. And during that entire time they refused to consider any other feature of the bill?

Mr. McNARY. That is correct. They refused to read the bill, provision by provision and section by section, as ordinarily obtains in a conference.

Mr. BORAH. Then they changed their attitude, and were willing to consider other features of the bill?

Mr. McNARY. Later; yes.

Mr. BORAH. Did they state why they changed their attitude?

Mr. McNARY. I do not know that any statement of that kind was made, but I can state to the Senator frankly my view on that subject.

In discussing the matter, I had stated to them several times, the Senate conferees had made it clear, that they would not go forward unless the House conferees did come into conference, abide by the usual practice, and read the bill, provision by provision. One day on the floor of the Senate two of the House conferees were here, and I discussed the matter with them briefly; and I again made it clear to them that there would be no more conferences until they would come in in the usual way and read the bill section by section. At that time they said they thought they would do that, and they would consider the matter and would let me know later. The morning following, a telephone message came to me saying that they would come into conference. Whether or not they said anything, when they came into conference, in justification of their attitude, I do not know. I do not recall that they did.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The press carried the statement that the House conferees had announced that they would not participate in a conference on the bill until the Senate conferees announced their willingness to recede from the debenture provision. Is that correct?

Mr. McNARY. I do not remember whether there was an article of that kind or not.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I know there was an article of that kind. I am asking the Senator about the truth of what was said in the article. The press generally carried the statement that the House conferees had announced that they would not participate in any conference on the bill except upon the condition that the Senate conferees would announce their willingness to recede from the Senate amendment incorporating the debenture plan.

Mr. McNARY. So far as I know, Mr. President, that matter was not discussed with the House conferees. I stated, the day the conference opened, that the time to consider what the Senate conferees would do would be after all of the provisions of the bill had been considered and read.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. So far as the Senator knows, then, the House conferees did not serve notice of that kind on the Senate conferees?

Mr. McNARY. Absolutely not.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What was the reason they gave for refusing to consider the bill in the conference for five days?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I stated a moment ago the three grounds—particularly the ground that it trenched upon the prerogatives of the House. Their first attitude, they claimed, was to refuse to accept the bill, and send it back to the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That was because the debenture provision was in it?

Mr. McNARY. Certainly.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McNARY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senate conferees, as I understood, did not accede to the claim of the House conferees that the debenture was a prerogative of the House?

Mr. McNARY. Oh, no, indeed!

Mr. BROOKHART. They did not consider the merits of the debenture plan, the Senator said, but finally they receded from the debenture plan. On what ground did they recede—on the merits of the debenture plan or upon the constitutional claim of the House conferees?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, speaking for only one of the Senate conferees—one of the three who receded—I took the position, and I take it now, that the House conferees would go no further in the matter, and we either must take the bill without the debenture or have no bill at all. I exercised my own earnest judgment, and did not take into consideration any of the arguments back of the House conferees. I considered the present situation.

Mr. BROOKHART. Then the Senator just receded by acclamation, and not for any particular reason?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. I understood the Senator to say that the position of the Senate conferees had been and was that nothing would be done until the conferees of the House agreed to consider every provision of the bill.

Mr. McNARY. I think that was my statement; yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. At what time did the Senate conferees change their position? They did recede without ever having considered the provision incorporated in section 10, I believe.

Mr. McNARY. That is, the debenture provision?

Mr. CARAWAY. The debenture provision.

Mr. McNARY. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. I say, at what time did the Senate conferees change their avowed intention of never considering the bill at all unless every provision of it should be considered?

Mr. McNARY. The Senate conferees?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; at what time did they change?

Mr. McNARY. The Senate conferees refused to take any action on the debenture proposal until the House conferees should comply with the usual practices of conferences.

Mr. CARAWAY. I misunderstood the Senator, then, because I thought the Senator said that the position of the Senate conferees was that they would not proceed until the House conferees agreed to consider every provision of the bill.

Mr. McNARY. Oh, no. It was a situation which I thought needed a display of courage and persistence by the Senate conferees until the bill in its entirety had been considered.

Mr. CARAWAY. But it never was considered in its entirety.

Mr. McNARY. All the provisions save the debenture were gone over and worked out.

Mr. CARAWAY. You could not say it was considered in its entirety when you left out one of the most important provisions.

Mr. McNARY. Very well. The other provisions had been passed on in the House, and were in the Senate bill, and after we had come to an accord on all the provisions that were in the two bills, then the question came up whether we would take the debenture out or leave it in.

Mr. CARAWAY. And the House conferees declined to discuss it with the Senate conferees?

Mr. McNARY. It was not discussed, because of the fact that the House would not consider it on its merits. It never passed the House.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senate conferees finally receded on the sole ground that the House would not consider it?

Mr. McNARY. That is the proposition. I am speaking for myself, and if any other member of the conference entertains a different view I want him to express it.

Here was the situation: We had agreed upon all the provisions of the bill except the debenture. It did appear to me, in the exercise of my honest judgment, that the House would not consider the debenture, and I thought, and I still now urge and insist, that the bill without the debenture will be of considerable assistance in the agricultural situation, and I felt the necessity——

Mr. CARAWAY. At what time in the conference did the Senator reach the conclusion that he had to yield to the House, that it would not consider the debenture plan?

Mr. McNARY. The House made it very plain to the Senator from Oregon from the start that it did not intend to recede from its position in opposition to the debenture proposal.

Mr. CARAWAY. And the Senator consented from the start that the debenture plan never was to be considered—conceded from the beginning that it never was to be considered.

Mr. McNARY. I did not consent to or concede anything.

Mr. CARAWAY. I wanted to know when the Senator reached the conclusion that he would recede.

Mr. McNARY. For five days we were discussing the matter, and the House conferees repeatedly stated that they would not in any way recede from their position in opposition to the debenture proposal. The Senate conferees argued that probably there would be other disagreements than on the debenture, and we wanted to consider those, but fortunately we came to a common agreement on all save the debenture proposal.

Mr. CARAWAY. The fact is that that is all that was in serious dispute?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. McNARY. I yield further to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. I say that was the only thing that was in serious disagreement?

Mr. McNARY. That was the stumbling block, of course.

Mr. CARAWAY. And the conferees agreed on the rest of it immediately.

Mr. McNARY. Oh, no. We spent five or six days on the other provisions.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Do I understand from the Senator that it was the position of the House conferees that rather than consider the debenture proposal there would not be any legislation?

Mr. McNARY. I interpreted their action to mean that particular thing; yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Was there ever at any time any private intimation conveyed to the House conferees on the part of the Senate conferees, or any of them, that if they would come in and be good for a while, after a little the Senate conferees would yield, and all would be peaceful?

Mr. McNARY. So far as the chairman of the Senate conferees, the Senator from Oregon, is concerned, no intimation of that kind was ever given to the House conferees.

Mr. BARKLEY. I accept the Senator's word about it, but the newspapers were full of rumors that an understanding, subrosa, or subterranean, was being worked out.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I am curious to know one thing, and I am sure the Senator, with his usual frankness, will enlighten me. From the time the conference was organized, and up to the time that three of the Senate conferees threw up the white flag——

Mr. McNARY. Oh, Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. And saw that it was impossible to get the House to agree, was there any intimation, so far as the Senator knows, from the Secretary of Agriculture, or Mr. NEWTON, the Representative in the House representing the administration, or the President himself, as to any change of front with reference to this matter, or giving the conference the benefit of their views?

Mr. McNARY. Not that I know of. I can not speak, however, for the Secretary of Agriculture or the occupant of the White House. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just one more question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. McNARY. I am very happy to.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Washington Post—which is the mouthpiece of the administration [laughter]—this morning carries the statement that enough Senators have been brought over to accept the conference report by an agreement that they might be instrumental in naming the farm board. The Senator saw that?

Mr. McNARY. I did not read that.

Mr. CARAWAY. At least, then, the Senator will have something interesting to do to-day after he gets through making his speech. I wish he would tell us, if he pleases, before he is through, which Senator swapped off all the farmers of America for the chance to be instrumental in getting somebody appointed to a job that would pay $12,000 a year.

Mr. McNARY. Am I to speak for the various Members of the Senate, or is that directed to me?

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator now represents the administration, and the Post represents both of them, and I want to know who it was that offered to swap off the American farmer if he might be instrumental in putting one of his friends in a job.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am not conversant with the article in the newspaper to which the Senator refers. I do not hesitate to say that it is groundless.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does the Senator say with authority that it is groundless?

Mr. McNARY. I am speaking of what I know of my own knowledge. I do not know as to the matter about which the Senator inquires.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator always has been that way, but others have changed.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am willing to be interrupted at length to accommodate any Member of the Senate on this subject matter, which I want to discuss a little further. I know this concerning the proposal made to the Senator from Arkansas. A few days ago some folks wanted to talk to the President about members of the farm board, and he said explicitly he would not confer with them until after the bill had run its race in Congress, and had been signed.

Mr. CARAWAY. Was it some Senator who tried to talk to him?

Mr. McNARY. No.

Mr. CARAWAY. Somebody who did not have a vote wanted to talk to him?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am interested in the farm board. I have stated repeatedly that I have no candidates to propose. The appointment of the board will be a responsibility which should fall upon the President. I am only interested in a good board being appointed by the President, and for that we will have to trust to the judgment of the President.

I do not think any Member of the Senate would sacrifice a principle, or vote for or against a conference report, on account of his ability or desire to get an appointment on the board.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me ask a question, then. If any Senator changed his position, and did not change for that reason, then he would have a ground for suing the Post for damages, and the Post has indicated that it thinks that damages to character are worth a million dollars, because the owner recently sued somebody for having said that he had been excluded from a certain dinner before he had a chance to eat his pie.

Mr. McNARY. I have an exalted opinion of my colleagues, and I know none of them would change in any manner, even if they could appoint all the members of the board, which is to consist of eight.

Mr. President, having discussed the situation as to the debenture, I want briefly to outline the result of the conference report with respect to the other provisions of the bill. If the Senate will keep in mind that the structure of the House and Senate bills was precisely the same, and that the only differences were as to the mechanism and the administrative features, I can run rapidly through the changes that were made, and outline the bill as it is now presented to us in this report.

The Senate bill provided for a Federal farm board to consist of 12 members, to be taken from the 12 land-bank districts. Under the House bill 6 members were to constitute the board. An agreement has been reached whereby the membership board is to consist of 8 appointive members, with the Secretary of Agriculture as ex officio member.

The Senate bill provided that the salaries of the various members of the board should be $12,000. The House bill provided that the chairman should be appointed by the President, and his salary fixed by the President.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What is the basis for the agreement on eight appointive members? Was there any logical basis, or was that a compromise?

Mr. McNARY. It was a compromise. The Senate conferees felt that the House number was too small to be truly representative of agriculture. The House conferees insisted that 12 was an unwieldy number, and would result in town meetings, rather than an effective business administration of the law.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Are these eight members, under the compromise agreement, to be apportioned among the various sections of the country?

Mr. McNARY. If the Senator will bear with me, I shall come to that in just a moment.

The House conferees objected to any direction to the President to consider geographical or political grounds. But there is a provision in the conference report that the President shall give due consideration in appointing the members on the board to having the major commodities fairly represented. That is a mere direction which I presume will be observed by the President.

On the question of fixing the salaries, there was considerable argument. The House conferees insisted for some time that the President should have the right to fix the salary of the chairman. The Senate conferees insisted that that prerogative resided exclusively in the Congress. The Senate conferees prevailed in that matter, and the chairman is to be appointed by the President, and a vice chairman is to be appointed by the board, in accordance with the provisions of the Senate bill, and all of the salaries are to be $12,000.

Under the House bill the principal office was to be in the Department of Agriculture. Under the Senate bill it was provided merely that it should be in the District of Columbia. The Senate's provision was written into the conference report.

The Senate and House provisions on the commodity committee and advisory council were similar, and some of the administrative features of the Senate bill were accepted, such as the one relating to the manner of meeting of the commodity committee and its approach to the board.

In the loan sections the measures were practically the same. There was some elaboration of the loan feature placed in the conference report taken from the Senate and House bills.

The question of the physical facilities discussed here on the floor of the Senate, received modification. In the House bill there was a provision that when any money was used for the purpose of erecting or acquiring physical facilities for processing and storing, the board could not use the money unless it was shown by the cooperatives that there were no physical facilities or that none could be had at a reasonable rate of rental. The Senate did not place such a provision in the bill. An amendment to that effect was offered by the Senator from New York and was defeated by a small vote. The Senate and the House conferees agreed on a change in the language, providing that no facilities should be duplicated unless the board found that there were inadequate facilities where facilities were needed.

In the Senate bill the $500,000,000 was allocated to the four different purposes. In the House bill there was no allocation whatsoever, and the $500,000,000 was left to be used by the board according to its own judgment.

The Senate receded on that section providing that the insurance clause against the price decline, the clearing-house facilities, the loaning of money to cooperatives and stabilization corporations shall come within the $500,000,000 to be loaned in a manner to comply with the best judgment of the board.

The clearing-house provision was accepted as written in the Senate bill, the insurance provision as in the House bill was accepted, and the miscellaneous provisions are practically the same excepting——

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I observe that in connection with the clearing-house associations the word "perishables" has been omitted. Am I to understand the attitude of the conference committee is that perishables are really included as one of the agricultural products? In other words, the change of the wording does not change the fact that perishables are included within the terms of the bill?

Mr. McNARY. Oh, no; it refers to all agricultural products, and that includes perishables, such as vegetables and fruits. It covers the whole field of agricultural products.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, there is a change in the language, because originally the clearing-house provision related only to fruits and vegetables.

Mr. McNARY. In the Senate bill the provision pertained to perishables. In the House bill it related to all commodities. It occurred to the Senate conferees that probably it should be made applicable to all agricultural products.

Mr. COPELAND. There is this difference too, is there not: That while the amount to be used for the clearing-house association in the Senate bill was limited to $50,000,000, all of the resources of the board are now back of it?

Mr. McNARY. Yes; all resources are back of every provision of the bill, including the clearing house and insurance against price decline.

Mr. COPELAND. So that fruits and vegetables are just that much worse off than they were before?

Mr. McNARY. That may be the view of the eminent Senator from New York.

In the stabilization provision there was a similarity, except for the fact that the Senate provision was thought more liberal and elastic and would prove more effective to agriculture. In the House provision the activities of the stabilization corporation were mainly limited to handling the surplus, which might be called the surplus-control agency. In the Senate bill there was a provision that it should also act as a marketing agency for cooperative associations. The House receded on that provision and the Senate provision stands with some minor changes only.

I think I have probably covered the major differences. There are some differences in language and wording and arrangement of the provisions of the bill, but that in a general way covers the situation as contained in the bill. I think with that statement I shall rest the matter with Members of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON and Mr. BURTON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. McNARY. I yield first to the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. I want to have settled definitely the parliamentary situation. I understood the Senator from Oregon to state—and doubtless he is familiar with the situation—that a vote against the report would send the bill back to conference and that thereupon the Senate conferees would be required again to seek a conference with the House. That is what I shall desire to see done, if it be possible. Will a mere vote against the conference report accomplish that result? I submit that as a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report. If the conference report is not agreed to, the Senate will have to initiate action to secure a new conference.

Mr. JOHNSON. Pardon me——

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no conference committee to which the bill may now be committed, the House having acted.

Mr. WATSON. The House having acted, its conferees are discharged automatically and there is now no conference committee to which the matter can be recommitted or referred.

Mr. JOHNSON. There must be some way of reaching that situation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is very simple. It happens hundreds of times in every session of Congress. All that is necessary to do is for the Senate to insist upon its amendment and ask for a further conference and direct the Chair to appoint conferees on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thought he had stated that situation.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator from Arkansas is entirely correct in that statement.

Mr. JOHNSON. I wanted to have the matter very clear because I feel perfectly certain that if it were not automatically accomplished as suggested, it could be accomplished by appropriate resolution.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama will state it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Suppose the Senate should vote down the conference report and we should ask for a further conference. The House having already, as I understand it, very hastily passed the bill yesterday with the debenture plan out, would it not be necessary then for the House to reconsider the bill as it has passed there before they could have a further conference with the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would not think so.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President——

Mr. McNARY. I yield now to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BURTON. I desire to ask the Senator from Oregon if section 8 of the bill as agreed upon in conference was not a Senate provision rather than a House provision? It provides for rates of interest on loans to any cooperative association or stabilization corporation.

Mr. McNARY. Yes. That provision was taken bodily from the Senate bill as it passed the Senate. In the House bill the rate of interest was left to the board.

Mr. BURTON. Has any computation been made as to what could possibly be the rate of interest under that provision?

Mr. McNARY. Yes; 3.8 per cent. I think 3.8 per cent is the lowest rate of yield of any Government obligation.

Mr. BURTON. Lower than the ordinary rate of interest?

Mr. McNARY. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to discuss briefly the conference report and to give the reasons which impelled me to decline to sign the report. I do not know that I shall discuss the merits of any particular amendment or any particular bill. If I do, it will be after I shall have discussed the parliamentary situation and the principle that is involved in it.

In every legislative body in the civilized world consisting of more than one branch, ultimate agreement, in case the two branches of the legislative body disagree on any particular item of legislation, is reached through conference committees. I wish the Senate would bear that in mind. We have two branches of Congress. In dealing with measures of importance, unless we pass each other's bills without amendment, conference committees are necessary, and the very theory of a conference committee is a compromise between the two branches of the legislative body. Without this arrangement there never would be reached agreements that would result in legislation. These things are fundamental, much more important than any one bill.

The House passed a farm relief bill. The Senate amended it by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the Senate bill. In some respects the two bills were the same. It was the duty of the conference committee when the matter came before them to try to harmonize the two bills. There were many differences between the two bills, some 50 or 60 of them all together, some of them of considerable importance, some of them of minor importance, but everyone knows that the greatest disagreement and the greatest difference between the two bills was what was included in the Senate bill as section 10, known as the debenture plan.

When the Senate passed the bill with the debenture plan included as a part of its amendment to the House bill it then went to the House. There was some feeling in the House that in putting on the debenture-plan amendment the Senate had transgressed a constitutional limitation, that it was a revenue measure, and that as a matter of fact under the Constitution it could not originate in the Senate.

For the sake of my argument—and for that matter I am willing to admit this without reference to the argument—I concede, to begin with, that that is a question upon which men have a right with some reason to take either side. According to my way of looking at it it is perfectly plain that the position of the House is constitutionally untenable and that the Senate had a right to put on the amendment. When it was taken up in the House the House, differing from the usual procedure, sent it to conference by a House resolution (H. Res. 45) reading as follows:

Whereas in the opinion of the House there is a question as to whether or not section 10 of the amendment of the Senate to H. R. 1 contravenes the first clause of section 7 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States and is an infringement on the rights and privileges of this House, but in view of the present legislative situation and the desire of the House to speedily pass legislation affording relief to agriculture and with a distinct understanding that the action of the House in this instance shall not be deemed to be a precedent, so far as the constitutional prerogatives of the House are concerned: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 1, with a Senate amendment, disagree to the Senate amendment, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate, and that the Speaker shall immediately appoint the conferees.

That resolution was passed by the House, and in accordance with it the motion was made as provided in the resolution. The House disagreed to the Senate amendment, authorized the Speaker to appoint conferees, and the Speaker appointed the conferees.

I think it is fair to say if the House had the idea that the Senate had exceeded its constitutional right it was commendable in the House, on account of the emergency of the situation, to waive that right, and that is what the resolution did, if it did anything. I do not believe anybody can doubt that whatever objections the House might have on account of its belief that the Senate was not constitutionally permitted to add the debenture plan amendment, they waived it for this particular case.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The resolution carries the plain implication, of course, that the House conferees would deal with this conference as they would deal with any other conference.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly. The Senator has anticipated me.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. Does it not state in the preamble that they waive it in that they state that it shall not be taken as a precedent?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and they give the reasons for it. I do not believe anyone can doubt the statement that whatever there may be in the controverted proposition as to whether the Senate had a constitutional right to put that amendment on the House bill, the House in this case waived it. If they had not waived it and had stood on the rights that they claimed were theirs, they would not have received the bill; they would not have gone to conference on it. But they waived it and they went to conference. The Senate conferees, it seems to me, had a right to assume when they met the conferees of the House in conference that the question of constitutionality so far as this matter was concerned was entirely eliminated and that it had nothing whatever to do with the conference committee.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. It seems to me the language is unmistakable.

Mr. NORRIS. I think so.

Mr. COPELAND. They raised the question, but, "in view of the present legislative situation, and the desire of the House speedily to pass legislation affording relief to agriculture, and with the distinct understanding that the action of the House in this instance shall not be deemed a precedent," they resolved that "it shall be in order to move" in the usual way.

Mr. NORRIS. "That it shall be in order to move in the usual way"; and that was done.

When we met in conference, to begin with, we were confronted with what I think is fair to denominate an ultimatum upon the part of the House conferees that they would not consider the debenture amendment or any other amendment in dispute between the two Houses unless the Senate conferees should first agree to recede from the debenture amendment, or should agree to take it back to the Senate for another vote in the Senate on the proposition. We immediately called their attention to the fact that we could not take it back to the Senate; that under the parliamentary situation the papers were in the possession of the House conferees; in other words, that the Senate had no jurisdiction, and hence whatever went back in the way of a conference report must first go to the House and be acted on. They saw that point and admitted it. So there was but one thing left. The conferees on the part of the House absolutely refused from the beginning to the end of a 10-day conference to take the debenture provision back to the House and permit that body to vote on it.

Now, I wish the Senate to visualize that picture, that undisputed state of facts, that condition which confronted the Senate conferees. The Senate after full debate, and by a roll call vote, had acted upon the debenture plan; the House had not voted on it, and it has not voted on it to this day. We could not bring it back here under the parliamentary situation if we had been willing to do so without action of the House of Representatives, which body, I repeat, had possession of the papers and had jurisdiction first to act, as subsequent events have shown they did act first upon the conference report.

So the dispute narrowed itself down to this, that the Senate having adopted a particular amendment on which the Senate had voted but the House had not voted, the Senate conferees must recede, and the House conferees refused to do anything until the Senate conferees should recede. Can you imagine, Senators, what would be the condition if that should be established as a precedent for conferences between the House of Representatives and the Senate? If carried to its logical conclusion, it would mean the end of all conferences; it would mean that one House or the other would be taken by the throat and held up by the coordinate body. If Senators will read the report which is in the usual form, they will see that it begins "after a full and free conference." Such a conference would not be a free conference; such a conference would tie the hands of one body of the National Legislature.

Mr. COPELAND. By the action of a very few men.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator from New York when he interposes the remark that it would do so "by the action of a very few men." Every day for five days the conferees, 10 of us all together, were in session without there being a single sentence of either bill read, without an examination of a single paragraph of either bill being made, without the taking up of any of the disputed amendments running all through the bill. For five days we were deadlocked on that one proposition, the House conferees refusing to do a single thing.

However, in that action the House conferees were not unanimous; they were four to one. We plead, especially after we had been in session for a day or two, with the conferees on the part of the House to forget the debenture amendment for the time being and commence, as conferences usually do, at the beginning of the bill, to run through the amendments and see whether or not we could agree on other amendments as to which the two Houses were in disagreement. In that way, perhaps, we should find other amendments as to which we could not reach an agreement or as to which the conferees might want to go back to their respective bodies for instructions. The conferees on the part of the House refused to do that; they refused to budge, and at the end of the fifth day the conference broke up without any agreement or understanding having been reached that they would ever again meet. There was no disposition on the part of the four conferees of the House of Representatives to compromise in any way.

The debenture plan was not considered on its merits. That situation has been discussed to some extent, and I wish to refer to it. There were casual remarks made about the debenture plan, as there were about other matters as we went along, without reading any of the amendments, without reading a line of the bill, as is usual, the only contention for five days being whether the House conferees were willing to go back to their body and have the debenture plan voted on or whether the Senate conferees, having come from the Senate where a vote had already been had, should recede notwithstanding the vote of the Senate.

Mr. President, the Senate having adopted an amendment to the bill, especially one of great national importance such as the debenture plan, and the measure having gone to the House, that body having agreed to a conference, which is characterized as a "full and free conference," having said, "We are ready to treat with you gentlemen; we are ready to compromise; we are ready to sit around the table and iron out our differences," what would our condition be in the future if we should on this vote establish such a precedent that when hereafter the two Houses shall meet in conference the other House may say, "Gentlemen, on this amendment we have not voted, it is true, but you must recede, and, unless you do so, there will be no bill; that is the ultimatum; unless you lie down, there will be no bill"?

I want to say in justice to the House conferees that during the course of the five days' discussion they tried to argue, although in the end, I think, they practically admitted that their argument was not logical, that the House had voted on the debenture amendment and had rejected it. In that connection they cited the resolution adopted by the House sending the bill to conference, which disagreed to all of the Senate amendments, 50 or 60 of them, one of them being the debenture amendment. That is the ordinary course which is followed. As we all know, when a bill is sent to conference it is done practically by unanimous consent, one House disagreeing to all the amendments of the other House. That is the only thing that happened in the House, except that they had a vote on the resolution.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. SWANSON. The injustice of the procedure followed in the House lies in the fact that by the resolution which they adopted they precluded the priority that would be ordinarily given to a motion to concur, which takes precedence over a motion to disagree.

Mr. NORRIS. Absolutely.

Mr. SWANSON. If the resolution had not been adopted in the House, a motion could have been made to concur in the Senate amendments, but the resolution adopted by the House prohibited anything of that kind from being done and prohibited any amendment being voted on. The resolution really bound and gagged the House, for, as I have said, a motion to concur would have taken precedence over a motion to disagree, and by the action taken on the resolution the Members of the House were prevented from expressing their will.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator for that suggestion.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. NORRIS. First, let me comment on the suggestion just made by the Senator from Virginia. I hope Senators will get the point he has made. In the House of Representatives the farm relief bill from the Senate was on the Speaker's desk; whenever that bill was laid before the House it would have been in order, unless a special rule had been provided, to move to concur in any Senate amendment or in all the Senate amendments, and such a motion, under parliamentary procedure and likewise under the rules of the House, would have taken precedence over a motion to send the bill to conference, because it would have brought the two Houses together. That is the theory of parliamentary law. By the adoption of the resolution that opportunity was precluded, the hands of the Members of the House were tied; they were not allowed to have a vote upon the debenture amendment or any other amendment; they were prohibited from having a vote; they were prohibited from making a motion to concur, and deprived of the opportunity of getting a roll-call vote on such a motion. They had no opportunity and have had no opportunity up to this hour to vote on the debenture amendment.

While it was not discussed to any considerable extent, this thought was brought out in the conference, that as a result of the procedure which was followed Members of the House of Representatives from all over the United States will be enabled to go back to their constituencies and in their political contests truthfully to say: "I have not yet voted on the debenture plan; I am not on record on it." The procedure taken enables a Member of the House, if he wants to do so, to talk during the next campaign, say, with one who favors the debenture and tell him how he would like to have it, and talk with a man who is against it and tell him a different story. I am not charging that anything of that kind is going to be done, but that can happen as the result of this parliamentary procedure. In other words, the House of Representatives have never been permitted by their leaders to register their will on the debenture plan.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. I have understood that the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from South Carolina, two of the conferees, told the House conferees that if they would permit the House to vote on the debenture proposition, and the House should then vote it out, that would settle it.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEFLIN. And they declined to permit the House to vote?

Mr. NORRIS. They declined to do that.

I say now, Mr. President, that where there are two branches of the legislature, legislation must necessarily be a compromise. I am not objecting to a compromise. I am one of those who favored the debenture amendment; but I should be for this bill if it did not have the debenture amendment in it. I think it will accomplish some good—not nearly as much as a good many think it will accomplish, but in my judgment the debenture amendment accomplishes the one thing that is necessary to give relief to American agriculture, and that is to take care of the export surplus of farm products. Everybody who has studied this matter admits that it will do that to the extent of one-half of the tariff, and give the American farmer the benefit, not of all the tariff, but of one-half of it.

I realize that if I can not get what I want, as a good legislator I ought to be willing to compromise. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and I both said, "If you will take this matter back to the House and let the House have a vote on the debenture plan, and the House votes it down, we are then willing to recede and to sign a unanimous conference report"; and I should be willing to do that yet. If the House insists that it will not favor the debenture plan, and will vote it out, I am in favor of passing the bill without it. But we were presented with the fact that the Senate had put it in on a roll call, the House had never had an opportunity to vote on it, and the House had the papers; so, under those circumstances, how could we get it back? Only by having the House vote on it first. Even if the Senate conferees had been willing to come back and let the Senate vote again on it when the House had not voted at all, there was no way in which we could do that. We could not have done it under the parliamentary situation. They would have had to act first.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator has had a long experience with conferences between the two Houses. I should like to ask him if any move has ever been made to have a stenographic report made of the proceedings of a conference committee?

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I should like to ask the Senator if any move has ever been made to have a record vote of the motions and the action of the various members of a conference committee on questions that arise in a conference?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have advocated that for a good many years, and I am not sure but that at some time in my career I have introduced resolutions providing for that to be done; but I am not sure even of that. There is not any record of votes or of anything that is said. I have always believed, and still believe, that conference committees are often compelled, from the very necessity of the situation, to yield to things that are undesirable, and sometimes they unintentionally get into legislation a good many jokers that have never seen the light of day, that have never been held up for public discussion and argument in either branch of the Legislature; so that it is often a very dangerous procedure and results in much bad legislation.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I agree with the Senator as to the undemocratic character of these conferences. I should like to ask the Senator if it is not a fact that if there were to be such rules, providing for a certain amount of publicity and information to the Members of both bodies, they would have to be concurred in by both the House and the Senate?

Mr. NORRIS. They would; yes. They would have to be joint rules.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. DILL. If the Senate should reject this conference report, how long does the Senator think it would delay any action by the House? How long a delay would ensue before the House would take action?

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, I can not tell that. I know what has usually been the case in the past. If this conference report should be rejected, I assume that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] would immediately rise in his place and say, "Mr. President, I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendments and ask a conference with the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees"; it would go through by unanimous consent, and the conferees would be appointed; the action of the Senate would be messaged over to the House, and they would agree to the conference, and the conferees would go back and take up the matter again.

Mr. DILL. But the Senator was a member of this conference, and he knows something of the rather adamant attitude of the House Members about even taking a vote on the question. I thought possibly the Senator had some opinion as to whether they were willing to go back shortly, or whether they would hold the Congress here for a long period of time on the so-called constitutional theory.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think that would happen. What I think would be the outcome would be that the House would take a vote. The House never has had a vote yet; and all we are asking is that the House vote on this amendment that we put into the bill. If the House voted to refuse to put it into the bill, to reject the amendment on a roll-call vote, I myself should not be averse to receding then, either in the Senate or in a conference committee; but what I am contending for here is that the House never has taken action. We have an honorable, honest right to ask of them that they shall act upon this amendment that we have put on their bill.

That is true of every legislature on earth consisting of two bodies. If the House had felt that it was going to stand on what it believed to be a constitutional right, then it ought not to have passed this resolution. Then it ought to have said, "We refuse to consider this bill because your amendment is unconstitutional." If they had stood on that, there would have been only one thing for the Senate to do, and that is to withdraw from its position, because from that action of the House there is no appeal. Their discretion can not be mandamused by a court, or anything of that kind; and, so far as their stand is concerned, they are supreme.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. It seems to me, however, that the same principle would apply to the Senate. If we insisted that we had a constitutional right to put on the debenture amendment and that they should surrender their position, we would be in exactly the same position that the House would be in if they insisted that it was unconstitutional.

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly. Then there would have been no bill. That would have been the result. Either House can stand on what it believes to be its constitutional right; but, in my judgment, that never should have had a moment's consideration after the House passed that resolution waiving this right.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Before the Senator leaves the discussion of House Resolution 45, is it not the Senator's interpretation of the "whereas" or the preamble of that resolution that it was an instruction by the House to its conferees to consider the debenture provision in the conference?

Mr. NORRIS. I think so.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And, if that is the Senator's interpretation, will the Senator state to the Senate whether in his opinion the House conferees did carry out that instruction and consider the debenture upon its merits, on the same footing and with the same procedure that other provisions in disagreement were considered?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no! The House conferees and the House itself, on account of the action of the House conferees, have never yet considered the debenture plan on its merits. They have never had any consideration of it.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SWANSON. I understand that the Senator's contention is this: When there are two legislative bodies, it is intended to get the legislative will of the two bodies to agree——

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. And not the legislative will of conferees. They are simply agents; and legislation can only be effected by getting a concurrence of the legislative wills of the two bodies where a legislature or a Congress is composed of two bodies.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly.

Mr. SWANSON. And where they refuse to test the legislative will, refuse to try to get a concurrence in the will of the two bodies, it is contrary to the genius of our institutions.

Mr. NORRIS. There is no doubt on earth about it.

Mr. SWANSON. It is simply allowing a machine that dominates the will of the people and prevents them from having an opportunity to pass on the matter to thwart what is a constitutional right, as much belonging to the Senate as it does to the House, to try to get an expression of the will of the body and not the will of a few selected leaders or conferees.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. I think the Senator is right in that. Now, the House conferees have refused to permit the House to have a vote on this proposition. Why? Because it would embarrass some people to vote. In other words, the House of Representatives is to be dominated by the cowardice of Members who agree to rules which will prevent them from answering on a roll call to their constituents who elected them.

This seems to me to be the effect of the rules that have been adopted; and the Senate has a right, as the Senator said, to see that the legislative will of the two bodies is obtained by votes in the Senate and votes in the House, and not have means taken to prevent these votes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, going back for just a moment to the constitutional provision, if the House had taken action as a House and had refused to act on this debenture amendment on the ground that it was their constitutional prerogative to initiate such legislation and that we had no such constitutional authority, while in my own mind I have no doubt whatever that they would have been wrong—I am as satisfied as I am of anything that we had a perfect right to put on the amendment—nevertheless, if the House had taken that stand instead of sending this bill to conference, I think I should have been compelled to admit that they had taken action that they had a right to take. We would have a right to stand on what we believed to be our constitutional privilege to put it in, and the result would have been no bill. As far as I am concerned, if that condition had arisen I would have stated in a minute that I thought the House was wrong, that we had a right to put on the debenture provision, but that I was not going to stand in the way of legislation on it, and I would have receded rather than to kill the legislation.

That would not have established a precedent that would have hurt anybody; but now, if we approve this conference report, we will establish a precedent that will come home to plague us as long as there is a Senate, and it will come home to plague the House, too. The Senate will sometimes be arbitrary, and take such a position; and the result is going to be an injury to the ordinary courtesies that ought to exist between the two Houses to give and to take in getting an agreement in regard to legislation.

If we approve this conference report, we are going to say that where we have voted by roll call on an amendment, and the other House has never had an opportunity to vote, we are going to let two or three men say that they never shall have an opportunity to vote, and the other branch of the Legislature, although having voted, must take back the bill. That is the precedent we are going to establish if we approve this conference report. It means much more than this bill. It means something that will come back to plague Congress in the years that are to come, after we have all gone away. If we are going to establish that kind of a precedent in Congress, concession and consideration and argument and an attempt to get together and to compromise and agree will have disappeared.

Mr. President, after we had been in session five days, and the conference broke up as I have stated, several days afterwards we were called in conference again.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. NORRIS. I do.

Mr. SWANSON. Before the Senator takes up that subject, I desire to call his attention to this fact: I have been on conferences with House conferees. There are certain amendments of the Senate to which they can not agree, but which they must carry back to the House for a vote.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly.

Mr. SWANSON. That is, if the Senate makes amendments, under certain rules of the House the conferees can not agree to these amendments. They must be carried back to the House for a vote. Here, however, they refuse the Senate the privilege of having a vote, when they prevent their own conferees from agreeing to certain things unless they have a vote in the House.

Mr. NORRIS. They will not permit their Members to have a vote. We wanted to let them vote. They said, in effect, "You have voted, and we have not. We are not going to vote.

Take the bill back. That is our ultimatum." That is just how this conference report gets before the Senate.

Mr. President, as I said, after we were in session five days, and gave up and went away without any agreement to reassemble, in two or three days we were called together again. Remember, up to that time we had never considered a single line of either bill, but we met again, and there was not a word said about debenture. We started in with the bills, and read them over, commencing at the beginning, meeting all the disagreements as they were reached. We discussed them courteously and in a gentlemanly manner, agreed on some things, and compromised on some. Each side would give here or give there. Sometimes new language was put in. Sometimes we were in sharp disagreement, and dropped the subject and said, "We will come back to it," and went on to something else. The next day we would go back and take up again the subject we had dropped.

We proceeded in that way for four or five days, I think five days. There was sharp disagreement on many items. The House conferees and the Senate conferees during that time acted as conferees ought to act; they gave some respect to the opinions of other members of the conference. We gave in and the House conferees gave in, we compromised here, put in new language there, and sometimes we met what we thought at the time might result in disagreements that would make it necessary to take the bill back to the Houses for advice. But finally we reached an agreement on everything, and nothing was said about debenture, the thing we ought to have acted on at the beginning, action on which the Senate conferees had struggled for five days to bring about.

Then, when we got practically to the end of the bill, in the regular course of things we came to the debenture, and then the House conferees got up and said, "We will not consider the debenture. We refuse to take it up." It was not read even then. They got their hats, and one of the Senate conferees suggested, "Let us meet again to-morrow." It was getting along toward closing time. I said, "Let us think this over, and we will take it up to-morrow." They said, "No; this is the time. We will not meet to-morrow. We are not going to meet any more. Surrender on debenture. That is the ultimatum."

Three members of the conference on the part of the Senate deemed it to be their duty, under all the circumstances, to recede on the debenture matter.

Mr. SWANSON. Did they show much belligerency and fight when they made the surrender?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no. All through the conference there was no bad blood and no anger. It was conducted in a gentlemanly and courteous manner.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. I would like to ask if the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from South Carolina received any material assistance from the other conferees on the part of the Senate in supporting the debenture proposition?

Mr. NORRIS. Up to the time of the final surrender the conferees on the part of the Senate were unanimous.

Mr. HEFLIN. They were?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. HEFLIN. But suddenly some of the Senate conferees surrendered?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it is not my intention to criticize anybody, or to try to judge anybody. I am not finding fault with anybody, not even with the House conferees, because if we waste our time in life trying to do that, we will find so much to do that we shall be busy with that all the time, and never be able to do anything of a progressive nature.

Three of the Senate conferees, when they reached that point, I think on the tenth day, when the House conferees were about to walk away, and everything had been agreed on in the bill except that, concluded, I take it with perfect satisfaction to their own judgments and consciences, to surrender, notwithstanding they knew then and know now, and will say now, that the action of the conferees on the part of the House was absolutely untenable as a parliamentary or judicial proposition. All three of the Senate conferees who signed the report will say, if they are asked the question now, that they think the House conferees' action was altogether unjustifiable and unprecedented. But they felt that rather than jeopardize this legislation or delay it any longer they would better recede, and they did so.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. SWANSON. Did the House conferees ever give any excuse why they made this distinction? The resolution would allow a vote of the House on anything in disagreement, but did they ever explain why they positively refused to let the House vote on a Senate amendment? Did the Senator ever hear that discussed?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I did hear it discussed at great length for several days.

Mr. SWANSON. I can not understand, if they waived the right to vote and permitted a vote on any disagreement, why they objected to the Senate conferees insisting on a vote on an agreement.

Mr. NORRIS. The House conferees argued that, in the first place, this amendment was contrary to the Constitution of the United States. They refused to agree to the proposal that the House had waived that point when they passed the resolution. That is one reason.

Then they said that another reason was that if they voted on the debenture plan, and it was agreed to, and put into the bill, President Hoover would veto it. That is the second reason.

Another reason was that a good many of the Members of the House—I think they thought a majority of the House—were opposed to it anyway, and did not want it under any circumstances.

Then, Mr. President, they argued that they had already voted on it in voting for the rule that adopted the resolution which I have read. I do not think they sustained any of those propositions in the argument. Incidentally, everybody must know that the result of this action is to shield the Members of the House from going on record on this important amendment.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. In a moment I will yield. Everybody knows and admits that the amendment is important. Everybody knows that it is the most important provision in the bill. Whether it is right or wrong may be a two-sided question, but I hold that any Member of either branch of Congress has no right to conceal from the country, from his constituents, how he stands on this matter, and he ought to be required to vote yes or no.

I do not condemn any man, no matter which way he votes, but I say that where the Senate has a record vote, where an amendment is as important as this one—its importance is conceded by everybody—every Member of the House, as well as every Member of the Senate, ought to go on record, and then we will abide by the result of the vote.

I yield now to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the question I desire to ask of the Senator from Nebraska is this: Am I correct in my interpretation of the Senator's statement that the debenture plan proposes to give the farmer one-half the benefit of the tariff?

Mr. NORRIS. That is correct.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Before I ask my second question let me call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska to two or three brief sentences taken from a publication which at one time was a very high authority. It is the Republican campaign textbook of 1928. I read two sentences appearing on page 23, from the acceptance address of the President delivered at Palo Alto. The first sentence is as follows:

> An adequate tariff is the foundation of farm relief.

The second sentence:

> I would use my office and influence to give the farmer the full benefit of our historic tariff policy.

The third sentence is taken from the Republican platform, and is as follows, quoting from page 87:

> A protective tariff is as vital to American agriculture as it is to American manufacturing.

Having these statements, promises, and pledges before us, the Senate having proposed to give the farmer the benefit of only one-half of the tariff—such proposal being contained in the debenture plan in the farm relief bill—is it true that when this bill went to conference the administration, acting through its leaders in the other body, refused to even permit the Members of such body to vote upon the proposal?

Mr. NORRIS. It is true that the House of Representatives was not permitted to vote and never voted upon it. I think I can place the responsibility, but I would rather not discuss that.

So far as the President's utterances are concerned, he obtained thousands of votes on those utterances. I was one of those who thought he was not explicit enough and who refused to accept those statements as being sufficiently accurate and concrete to answer the questions involved in the matter of the relief of agriculture. Of course, I became an outcast because I took that position.

It develops now that the President is opposed to this plan, which everybody knows and admits would give relief to agriculture, and everybody knows also that he was opposed to the McNary-Haugen bill, the only other measure that has undertaken to give the farmer the benefit of the tariff. Gentlemen knew that, of course, during the campaign.

Now the proposition is to redeem those words of the President, to redeem that pledge in the party platform. The President of the United States sent his letter to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate denouncing this very plan and without suggesting any other.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield,

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understood the Senator a few moments ago, it is his judgment, after this conference, that the sole reason actuating the members of the conference committee on the part of the House in not submitting the debenture plan to the House was the desire to relieve Members of the House of the embarrassment which would come from voting on the debenture plan.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not expressing an opinion on that, I have given the facts. Let every man draw his conclusion as he wants to.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is the conclusion I drew from the Senator's statement.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. SWANSON. The Constitution provides that on request of one-fifth of the Members of either House the yeas and nays shall be ordered on a question, showing that it was the spirit of the Constitution that there should be direct responsibility between a Congressman, whether in the House or the Senate, and his constituency. If I understand aright the situation presented by the Senator, the House adopted a rule in this matter and have continually made a rule which practically nullifies the provision of the Constitution that one-fifth of the Members of either House can get a recorded vote on a matter before it. Did the House conferees discuss that in conference and explain why they were seeking to destroy the spirit of the Constitution, which compels a vote when one-fifth of the Members demand it?

Mr. NORRIS. There were a good many things said about the Constitution of the United States, but I have been in the House of Representatives, as the Senator from Virginia has been, and we know how that provision of the Constitution is escaped. In the House the roll was called on the adoption of this resolution. Under the Constitution they had a right to do that. But having adopted a special rule, they then tied their own hands, and there was not any way to get a vote. There was no such thing possible as a vote. Hence there was no opportunity to have the roll called.

Mr. SWANSON. They could have a roll call which would carry out the spirit of the Constitution and disagree to all amendments, but by adopting the rule they prohibited a vote on anything else.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the effect of it.

Mr. SWANSON. Do the Members of the House seek by their rule to nullify the Constitution on an important matter like this, which guarantees the right of a constituency to know how its Representatives vote on the demand of one-fifth of the membership of the House? How do they explain the legerdemain by which they nullified the Constitution by the adoption of a rule? Did they ever explain that in conference?

Mr. NORRIS. No; and I do not think they ever will. No one has ever tried to do so, as far as I know.

Mr. President, I do not believe that I am going to take up the merits of the particular amendment. It seems to me it is well understood. Everybody who has studied it concedes, whether we favor it or not, that the debenture plan would do the work to the extent of one-half of the tariff. Pledges have been made in platforms, pledges made, as read by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], by the man who is now in the White House that the tariff is the way to save the farmer, and that he was going to use his influence to give the farmer the benefit of the tariff. There is no other plan which has been laid before Congress that will do it except the debenture plan. I have respect for the man who says, "I am not in favor of legislation in the way the amendment is presented." He has a perfect right to be opposed to it. But if he stands on the proposition that he is going to give the farmer the benefit of the tariff and says he is opposed to this plan and still wants to give the farmer the benefit of the tariff, then in all honesty and in all fairness he ought to come forward with a remedy that will do it. Be constructive as well as destructive.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Is it not fair to assume that the President thinks he will give the farmer the benefit of the tariff by tariff rates fixed on agricultural products in the tariff bill?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not think it is fair to assume that. I have too great respect for the intelligence and ability of the President to think that he believes, for instance, that a tariff of 42 cents a bushel on wheat is going to give the farmer 42 cents higher price for his wheat.

To my mind those who are opposed to the debenture plan and still believe in giving the farmer the benefit of the tariff, owe it to the farmer and to the country and to themselves to bring forward their remedy and let us see what it is. Let them either say, "We will not give him the benefit," or that "We can not give him the benefit," or that "We do not want to give him the benefit," and stop this deception and report a measure which will give him the benefit or suggest something else in place of it that will do so.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to ask the Senator a very practical question about the matter. I shall first read from an article written by Mr. Carlisle Bargeron in the Washington Post of this morning:

> If the administration leaders did have the situation as well in hand as they claim there would seem no need for the continuance of the hectic trading. The patronage of the farm board which the farm bill sets up even has been brought into play.
> Because of the tremendous pressure that is being wielded, the manner in which the question will be presented to the Senate, the general desire for a recess, and quite important fact that Senator KENDRICK, of Wyoming, left the city yesterday without arranging for a pair, and Senator SCHALL, of Minnesota, issued a statement a few days ago that he was inclined to vote for the farm conference report, it does seem that the debenture proponents face a difficult if not ultimately impossible task. Should KENDRICK, a Democrat, not be paired for the debenture, as he was before, and SCHALL, Progressive Republican, switch, that would be all the Republicans need.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not the floor, but I am sure the Senator from Nebraska will yield to the Senator from Minnesota when I conclude.

I am wondering what that statement means. Who is doing the "hectic trading"? What patronage is being offered to Senators to change their votes? Can it possibly be true that this statement in the paper is correct?

Mr. NORRIS. Before I yield to the Senator from Minnesota let me say that I would not place too much confidence in what the paper says. I do not know what the facts are. In all these matters, so far as I know, nothing dishonorable or wrong has been done in opposing the debenture plan. If there has been any offering of an office, or anything of that kind, I know nothing of it. I do not charge anything of the kind. I have no evidence of it. I am not going to find fault with any man even if he changes his vote.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let me say to the Senator that I agree to the statement he has just made. I do not suppose influence would be brought to bear upon Senators. It would be a marvelous thing and I can not believe it, and yet the public print under big headlines makes these statements, and I thought they ought to be presented to the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no doubt that even pressure of that kind is often brought to bear. I have no doubt that even positions and patronage are indirectly, at least, dealt in. So far as I know nothing of that kind has occurred in this case. I think it has occurred a good many times in the past, but I have no evidence of it here now.

I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee has just read into the RECORD a statement from this morning's Washington Post that I am likely to change my vote and accept this report of the conferees. I am likely to do nothing of the kind.

Mr. President, I want the people, through their Representatives of the House, to have an opportunity to express themselves upon the debenture plan. This Government is a government of law and not of men, even though those men be especially anointed by the mysterious and unseen power which seems to be bent on the complete destruction of agriculture. The House has not yet been given an opportunity to vote upon this debenture plan, and I am going to, as far as I can with my vote, help them to have that opportunity. I know that the people of my State want their Representatives in the House to express themselves, and I know the Representatives themselves want to express themselves, and I have no doubt as to what their expression will be if they get opportunity to do so. If the House votes down this debenture plan, then I am willing to consider what is left in the interest of agriculture. If the House votes down this debenture plan, I consider it my duty as a legislator to hold myself in readiness of compromise; but, Mr. President, it seems to me there is very little in this bill, outside the debenture plan, that is calculated to help agriculture. Almost every feature of it is already enacted into legislation under other departments. Farmers in my State and in North Dakota, under a present law, have borrowed 75 per cent of the value of their grain, and now they find that the price has even fallen below the amount they borrowed.

The debenture plan, as incorporated in this bill, is not arbitrary. It is up to the board as to whether or not they wish to use it. The board is to be appointed by the President, and certainly he will appoint no one that he has not the utmost confidence in; therefore, if the debenture plan is not needed, it need not be applied. The Republican Party, through our President and through its platform, promised equality of agriculture to other industries. The Republican platform and our President promised to make the tariff effective as to agriculture as it now is to industry. There is nothing in this bill as it stands, without the debenture plan, that will make tariff effective to surplus agriculture, and I defy anyone to point out where, under any construction, such conclusion could be arrived at.

Agriculture at present is receiving an average protection of 22 per cent. Industry is receiving an average protection of 46 per cent. The debenture plan seeks to give agriculture one-half the benefit of the tariff and eastern industry hollers subsidy. What else is it than subsidy which the protection of 46 per cent gives them? They are receiving under the present tariff law an average subsidy of 46 per cent, and they are receiving every per centum of it because through combinations of understanding they make the tariff effective up to its limit but because of the great numbers of farmers, combination understanding is impossible, and a surplus agricultural crop is sold in the domestic market not up to the level of the protection but sold in the world's market.

The debenture plan seeks to give agriculture the benefit of only one-half the tariff. Certainly that is not unfair to eastern industry. Agriculture is receiving an average of 22 per cent protection. With half of it effective, through the debenture plan, it would give an average protection to the farmer of only 11 per cent. Certainly that does not look unreasonable when compared to the 46 per cent full protection tariff now collected by other industry.

Like Louis XIV, the House conferees assume the function of, and call themselves the House and refuse to submit the debenture plan to a vote of the House. Mr. President, the assumption of the House conferees in their attitude is only equaled by the patience with which we are expected to endure such a royal dictum. They tell our conferees to tell us that if we do not accept their lordly commands that there will be no agricultural bill. When they depart from the House all wisdom will go with them. If we do accept their dictation whether we have an agricultural bill or not, we will have a fine political machine backed by $500,000,000, which ought easily with this start to indefinitely perpetuate itself.

Already we have seen what eastern industries intend to do to the farmer in the tariff bill which has passed the House under the same kind of gag rule. The present tariff bill as passed by the House leaves the farmer infinitely worse off than as things now stand, so that if agriculture is to be left to the tender mercies of the anointed few who seem to be voting the House on tariff and agricultural bills, we were better off if no legislation of any sort be had. This session was called for the purpose of relieving the farmer. From indications up to date, it seems to me it is making a thorough job. If the present tariff bill as passed by the House and this agricultural bill without the debenture plan is placed upon the statute books, it certainly will relieve the farmer of what little he now has.

Agriculture has depreciated in the last eight years $30,000,000,000. Last year's agricultural production sold for about $12,000,000,000. Had interest been figured even at 4 per cent on the farmer's investment, it should have brought him seventeen billion. The farmer needs to get value for what he produces above the cost of production. This agricultural bill does not even pretend to help him in securing an effective tariff.

The same old bunk is being fed the farmer concerning the debenture plan as was fed him concerning the equalization plan. Eastern industry does not intend to allow the farmer to have equality, does not intend to allow a law that will make the tariff effective to the farmer, insisting on cheap raw material while demanding a high subsidy with protection for the finished product. Of course, eastern industry realizes that so long as agriculture is kept down it will not only get its raw material cheaper but it will make the farmer boy a competitor to city labor and thereby reduce the cost of labor. Every indication so far, which appears to me from 15 years' of service in Congress, indicates that the stage is being set for the same old shell game. If the bill is not passed it will be the fault of the men who wanted the farmers to receive the benefit of the tariff, who wanted the Republican Party to keep its promises. If it is passed the farmer will be told when he finds that there will be no benefit from it that it has not had time to work yet.

I for one do not propose to be coerced either by organization, newspaper propaganda, or the smiles of the anointed to betray agriculture by promises of something that we know is not the truth. If we are going to benefit agriculture, let us do it in a man's way. Everyone knows and admits that it can not be done without making the tariff effective and we can not make the tariff effective without a debenture plan or an equalization plan. The equalization plan was discarded by the incoming administration, but the incoming administration did promise that he would make tariff effective. There is nothing in the present bill that will make it effective except the debenture plan, and we are told that the administration will veto the bill if that effective tariff plan is left in it. I can not believe it. If I can be shown where the agricultural bill makes the tariff effective, then I am willing to cut out the only thing, in my opinion, which does make it effective. I can not understand why the administration or why the East is so insistent that there be nothing in the bill to make tariff effective. Why they want us to cut out the very thing that will make it effective and offer nothing to take its place is beyond my comprehension.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator for his interruption and for his statement.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I would like to get the Senator's view on this phase of the matter. It is said that the President is opposed to the debenture plan. About that there seems to be no difference of opinion. The President will name the farm board. Under the terms of the bill as it passed the Senate the provision is that whenever the board finds it advisable, in order to carry out the policy declared in section 1 with respect to any agricultural commodity, to issue export debentures with respect to such commodities, the board shall give notice of such findings to the Secretary of the Treasury, and so forth. In other words, there is nothing in the bill as passed by the Senate that is mandatory upon the board with respect to putting into operation the debenture plan. It is purely optional. Is it reasonable to expect that a board appointed by the President in those circumstances, with the President's view and the administration's view so bitterly opposed to what they call "this vicious plan," would ever put into operation or into effect the debenture plan as provided in the bill?

Mr. NORRIS. It was put into the bill, I think, in the main, out of respect to the President himself, so that he would have the board to operate in case everything else failed. If the theory were correct that is sometimes advocated, that the balance of the bill would take care of everything else, there would be no occasion for this provision. If they find, as they will, I have no doubt, that the other remedies will not be sufficient they would have the remedy right at hand to put into effect at once, on the theory that if the President, even though opposed to this method himself, found that anything else that he tried did not give the relief which he, as well as the rest of us, had promised the American farmer, he would then take this remedy. It was done out of respect for him. Let him try his other methods first. That is the theory of it.

One of the reasons given by the House conferees why they would not consider the method was because the President would not sign the bill with it in. It may be that is true. I am not advised. We ought not to consider such things in legislating. If we are to do that, then we ought to abolish Congress and let the President legislate. We ought to have a Mussolini here instead of having a legislative assembly. If we are not going to follow our own convictions, if the National Legislature does not represent the convictions of the Members of the House and Senate, but only reflects the idea of somebody else that is carried through them on to the legislative books, then we ought to save the money of the taxpayers by abolishing Congress with all its salaries, including those of the clerks and others, and let the President legislate as well as execute.

If the President should veto this measure, I think it would only be a few days until we could pass it as he wants it. I would like to see it become a law with the debenture plan in it. If we can not get that—although I do not have much faith in getting much relief otherwise—I would be willing that somebody else should have what he thinks would bring relief. I do not want to put any obstacles in the way of bringing about a settlement of the question so we may get relief for the farmer.

If the President should veto the bill with the debenture plan in it, I think in three days' time we would pass the bill again without the debenture plan in it. Some think he will not veto it. Some say the way it is in the bill, not making it obligatory but making it optional, he would not veto it. Some who are close friends of the President have said to me that they do not believe he will veto it; that he would rather have it with that provision out, but that he would take it with the provision in. The President ought to be like we are. He can not always get just what he wants. We never get all that we want. We always compromise in all matters of legislation, and so should the President of the United States.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. In view of the decision of another body on the bill, it seems to me, if there is anything in representative government, the Senate, by receding from the original bill and adopting the conference proposal, would be doing nothing more nor less than putting the stamp of approval on a legislative paradox.

Mr. NORRIS. I think so.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator spoke of statements which had been made by the President that he would veto the bill. I am curious to know whether anybody ever attempted to quote the President directly.

Mr. NORRIS. No one that I know of.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad to hear that.

Mr. NORRIS. No one has quoted him to me.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield further to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield again to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am inclined to agree with the views expressed by the Senator. I can not see really any foundation for all the denunciation of the debenture plan and all the opposition to it in view of the language of the bill. It seems to me, if I were President, and the bill came before me, even if I thought the debenture plan was unworkable and unwise, I would not hesitate to sign the bill as an act of Congress, because the board I would appoint would have to determine whether it could be put into operation or not and whether it was wise to put it into operation.

Mr. NORRIS. And they will consult with the President.

Mr. FLETCHER. They will undoubtedly consult with him. If they do not do what he wants, he can deal with them as he sees fit, as he has the power to do and as he has the ways to do. It seems to me it would be perfectly safe to sign the bill even if it was passed with the debenture plan.

The Senator said there is some merit in the bill outside of the debenture plan; that there is some prospect and some hope of benefiting agriculture. I do not know. I have not a great deal of faith in the bill, and I have very grave doubt that agriculture is going to find any very great help or relief through it. I am afraid the farmer will have to go on as he has in the past, working and toiling in season and out of season, taking chances with the elements, and running all the risks and working for everybody but himself. The farmer will go on, pay his taxes, build churches, build school houses, build roads——

Mr. COPELAND. And build poorhouses.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; he will build poorhouses; he will devote himself to the good of the community, and obey the law; he will struggle along as best he can, and after this experiment shall have been put into effect, perhaps following two or three years' investigation, study, and research, there may be some plan worked out that will be of some benefit to agriculture.

I have always been most anxious to do what I could to help languishing agriculture; I appreciate most highly the importance of that great industry, which is carried on by those who, in the divine economy, live nearest the fountain of life, who produce the Nation's food and are the burden bearers of the Nation; but I can not see much help for them under this measure as framed by the conferees.

However, pursuing the thought that was in the Senator's mind, if after the farm board has begun to operate, after it shall have looked into the question, made a study of it, and conducted the experiments and demonstrations which it will make, with this enormous fund of $500,000,000, with the unprecedented autocratic power which is invested in it—the most stupendous bureau ever set up by the Government—it shall find that in order to bring relief to agriculture it must apply the debenture plan, and shall so recommend to Congress, is there any doubt but that Congress would proceed at once to enact the necessary legislation?

Mr. NORRIS. Probably not; but it is very much better, it seems to me, to have it enacted now, ready for the board to utilize. As the Senator from Florida has so beautifully and eloquently stated, the conditions of agriculture and of the American farmer are such that while we are proceeding with these years of experiment and research and work, he will lose his farm; he will die; and before the board gets through with its experiments the American farmer will be the American peasant.

Mr. President, let me say that the American farmer is too intelligent to be a peasant; he will not stand being reduced to that condition. He is something more than a slave. He knows that he produces the food that keeps us all alive; he knows that upon his shoulders rests the burden of civilization, and he is not willing to be submerged and to permit everybody else to prosper under a high protective tariff which makes him pay much more than he would otherwise pay for the commodities which he must purchase. The farmer is not objecting to the protective tariff if to him shall be given the right to receive its benefits equally with his fellow men, equally with the manufacturers, and all other classes.

Here is a proposition to give the farmer that benefit; here is a proposition that even its enemies say will work. There is no principle involved in it different from that which is involved in every protective tariff law put upon the statute books. What is the object of putting a protective tariff upon any commodity? It is to give the American producer of that article a higher price; but the farmers, unorganized, numbered by the millions, are unable to organize and combine as a few manufacturers can. The farmers produce a surplus and must sell it upon the world's market, knowing that the price they get upon the world's market fixes as well the price in the domestic market. The tariff in those cases does the farmer no good. Everybody has said, even President Hoover has said, it has been declared by both parties in their platforms that we must give to the farmer the benefit of the tariff the same as we give its benefits to the manufacturer. We must cease to compel the farmer to buy on this side of the tariff wall, in a protected, artificial market, and to sell his products on the other side in the world market. That is what the debenture plan proposes to accomplish, to redeem the promise to give to the farmer the benefit of the protective tariff. If we shall not do it, I should like to say to those who, like myself, believe in a protective tariff, when it is reasonable, that the farmers of America will tear down this structure which has been built up on an artificial basis under the protective-tariff system. We can no longer permit one-third of our population, those who are engaged in the most fundamental business of all, to be borne down by the burdens of the tariff without getting the benefits of the tariff. It is only common honesty; it is only fair play; and the farmers of the country are too intelligent longer to submit to this unjust and wicked system that does not permit them to share in the benefits which come to their fellowmen.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator from Nebraska has been discussing a subject which prompts me to propound a question to him. It seems to me that the attempt is repeatedly made in this country, especially during the time when we are discussing tariff bills, to create the impression that the levying of duties upon agricultural products is a benefit to the farmer and that by levying such duties the administration will take care of the farmer. I can appreciate that, coming from a manufacturing State, any opinion I might express might be discounted; but I should like to hear some Senator on this floor representing an agricultural State tell the truth, bare the whole story, and let the farmers of the country know to just what extent the levying of tariff duties on agricultural products is of benefit to them.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. If the Senator will pardon me a moment further, the limited number of manufacturers can obtain the full benefit of a protective tariff duty by combining to fix prices and thereby wipe out domestic competition or by organizing into trusts; in that way they can secure the last dollar of increased prices from tariff protective rates. But the agriculturalist, the man who produces eggs, poultry, cattle, corn, wheat, and hundreds of other agricultural products is in a competitive market; there are a million of such producers, and because they are in competition with each other the tendency is to pull down the price. Furthermore, there is very little competition from imports in the agricultural field—practically none except a few products from Canada that come into New England and some citrus fruits. Hence it seems to me that it ought to be clearly and emphatically made known that the levying of tariff rates on agricultural commodities is not expected to render any appreciable benefit to the farmer.

I entertain, though I oppose the principle, great respect for the position which Senators from agricultural States have assumed regarding the debenture plan, but I assume that their attitude in favor of the debenture is based upon the fact that the duties levied on agricultural products do not operate and are not effective; that the farmer must pay the increased prices resulting from the protective tariff duties given to the manufacturer, and that, therefore, the tariff scheme so far as giving the farmer duties on his products is concerned is not effective and beneficial; and so to offset the burden that comes to him because of the protective tariff, they say to the country, "We have proposed and are advocating here the debenture plan as the only plan which will give the benefit of the protective tariff duties to the farmer."

I inquire, Are tariff rates levied on agricultural products to any appreciable degree beneficial to the farmer? If yes, then, is not the farmer trying to get Government aid both by the pending tariff protection bill and by the debenture?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have forgotten some of the questions which the Senator first propounded; but I was particularly interested, if I remember correctly, in the Senator's expression of desire to have somebody from the agricultural section of the country tell the truth about the proposition as to whether the farmer receives the benefit of tariff duties levied on farm products. Mr. President, I am going to try to state the truth in answering the Senator's question, and I want to be just as frank as I can with the Senator. With respect to every agricultural product of which the farmer produces an exportable surplus he receives no benefit from the tariff duty levied on that product. I think that is true, and I am wondering if that is an answer to the Senator's question.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. In part it is an answer. But I go further and claim, except in sections of the country like New England, the protective-tariff rates on farm products do not increase prices.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Nebraska was going to suggest the other part of the proposition, I presume, that in the case of commodities of which we do not produce a surplus the farmer does get the benefit of the tariff duty.

Mr. NORRIS. That would follow, I think.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. But there, Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Let me say, first, in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho, that, at least in theory, the farmer would get the benefit if the commodities were of such a nature that their production were widely scattered over the country; but produced by, say, millions of farmers, he might not be able to get the benefit of all the tariff. The manufacturers get the benefit of the tariff in part because there are so few of them that they can combine and raise prices up to the level of the tariff wall. The manufacturers, even if they were not combined and were scattered over the country, would get some benefit from the tariff, but it would not be so steady as when they combine and control the prices all over the United States, or practically so. They would get some benefit, but probably not the full benefit, in my judgment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield further to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I quite agree with the Senator that because of the inability of the farmer to organize he may not be able to get the full benefit of the tariff; but my theory is that with the debenture covering the products of which we produce a surplus, and with a sufficient rate of duty upon those products of which we do not produce a surplus, the farmer will get the benefit of the protective-tariff system.

Mr. NORRIS. I think he will.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, as one of the members of the so-called "full and free conference" who did not sign the conference report, I think it is my duty to the Senate and to the country at large to state my impressions of that conference.

My colleagues here will recall that at the very first one of the five consecutive meetings we had I called attention to the fact that the great difference between the two bodies was in regard to the debenture plan. I insisted that we should reach some agreement, some understanding, as to whether or not it was to be considered. I thought it might expedite matters to have an understanding at the very outset. The House members emphatically declared in the very beginning that they would not consider the debenture plan as a part of the conference.

Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has gone over certain of the outstanding facts. I desire to state—and I am not going to take very much of the time of the Senate to do it—that when we first met, for the first five consecutive meetings the members on the part of the House had determined that they would not continue the conference if we insisted that the debenture plan should be discussed or considered as a part of the conference. The matter finally reached the stage where the Senate conferees made this proposition: I was very insistent on it. I said, "Let us take the bill, starting as we have always started, and go through it, and let all the points of difference, including the debenture, be dealt with as we have done heretofore." They declared emphatically that before they would consider the debenture they would refuse to meet again on any terms—not merely on the merits of the matter, on its constitutional origin, or whether or not the House would vote one way or another, but they would not consider it. That was the ultimatum that was handed to the Senate conferees, and we adjourned sine die.

Members of the other body, if I recall correctly, said that they would prefer having no farm bill at all to considering the debenture plan. They did not say that they would rather have no farm bill at all if the debenture plan was in it; but they said that they would rather defeat all farm legislation in toto than to consider, in conference, the debenture plan. They stated as their principal reason that it was an invasion of the prerogative of the House for us to incorporate the debenture plan in a bill.

We then made the proposition to them that if they would go back to their body and have a full and free expression on that point, we would be willing further to consider the matter, or allow it to influence our vote as to whether or not we would recede. They flatly refused that. They contended that the House was so overwhelmingly against it that it was a loss of time. I said, "Under the procedure that you have in your body it would take you less than a day to carry it back and get an expression." The matter finally boiled itself down to a point where they admitted that they did not propose to give the Members of the House an opportunity to vote on it.

I made this proposition in the conference: I said, "Taking it for granted that what you say is true, that there is an overwhelming majority, have you a moral right to prevent the Representatives of the several States from expressing themselves on a matter that has been discussed in a coordinate body and incorporated in an amendment? Have you a right arbitrarily to forbid them the privilege of expressing themselves, even though they are in the minority?"

For five consecutive meetings every member of the Senate conferees stood firm on the proposition that we had to consider the debenture plan if we were to go on in conference. The House conferees said, "With that understanding we will not go on," and assumed the responsibility of adjourning without any kind of a statement as to when we would meet, and so far as that day's conference was concerned the conference was practically at an end, for we adjourned sine die.

I have not been advised as to what transpired subsequent to that; of course, I was not supposed to be taken into the confidence of anyone in reference to what procedure took place, but several days afterwards we were advised that there would be another meeting. Just prior to that and during that time and at that time it was reported throughout the country in the press that the Senate conferees had agreed that if we would have another meeting they would recede from the debenture. That was printed throughout the country, and I took it upon myself to ask each member of the Senate conferees if any such agreement had been made. I at least had an opportunity to see two of them aside from the Senator from Nebraska and myself, and they emphatically denied ever having given expression to any such statement in the press.

It was evident, however, from the time the conference was called, that notwithstanding what this body had done in the form of farm-relief as expressed in that bill, particularly in reference to the debenture, the Members representing the other body had determined, and it was so understood in that legislative body by the powers that be, that there would be no farm bill at all rather than even consider the debenture.

I want the Senate to get this point clearly. We did not insist on their taking back the amendment for the purpose of having it incorporated in the bill. We simply asked a specific expression as to the debenture on the part of the body they represented. We went so far as to say to them that if they would take the matter back to the House on its constitutional phase, and decide that we, as a body, had no right to consider it, we would then allow that to influence our attitude. We then made the further proposition to them, if that was not agreeable, that they take it back and have a vote on its merits. They emphatically refused that on the ground that they had heard enough expressions from different Members of the House to convince them that a majority would vote against it.

Then I made this statement in the committee: I said, "Then you propose to legislate for the American people upon rumors as to which way the body that is elected here would vote."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], the chairman of the committee, in his discussion of the conference report this morning, made the statement, as I understood him, that in that connection it was contended by the House conferees that the House had actually expressed itself on the debenture plan, and had indicated its disapproval of it when the House adopted the rule under which the farm relief bill was considered in the House.

With the Senator's permission, I call attention to that rule, House Resolution No. 21, appearing on page 124 of the RECORD of the House, April 18, 1929. The language of the rule, after providing for general debate, is:

> After the conclusion of the general debate the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

That is the rule under which the body at the other end of the Capitol disposed of this bill; and I respectfully suggest that there is nothing whatever in the rule, not even an implication that in the adoption of that rule the House was opposed to the debenture plan.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I took it upon myself to make extensive inquiry on the other side as to the interpretation they placed on the vote on this rule in sending this matter to conference; and without a single exception, everyone expressed himself as being in favor of the House having an opportunity to vote on it. They did not consider that that was at all conclusive as to the attitude of the House in reference to the matter.

Mr. President, it was very apparent to me that the conferees on the part of the House were running what I considered a bluff. After we had considered the bill and gotten it in the form it is in, I, for one—and I am only speaking my convictions—believe that had we resolutely stood there and said, "You will either consider the right of the Senate to have a matter that it has honestly and seriously incorporated in this bill considered by the House or you will take the attitude that before you will consider it and vote on it in your body you will absolutely abort and destroy the hope of any legislation," there is no doubt whatever that the House conferees would have carried it back.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In connection with the resolution under which the bill was considered by the body at the other end of the Capitol, there was also a resolution—House Resolution 45—which I understand was discussed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], expressly providing for the consideration of the bill and the debenture plan.

Mr. SMITH. To be sure.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is true that the preamble to the resolution raises some question as to the right of the Senate under the Constitution to originate the debenture plan; but the resolution under which the House acted waived that question, in so far as it could be waived, in the following language:

> Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 1, with a Senate amendment, disagree to the Senate amendment, and agree to conference asked by the Senate, and that the Speaker shall immediately appoint conferees.

So that instead of the House expressing itself as against the consideration of the debenture provision, it actually, in the adoption of that resolution, squarely and unqualifiedly declared itself for the consideration of the debenture proposal.

Mr. SMITH. And waived all constitutional doubt as to this particular thing and sent the matter to conference.

Mr. President, I state that there is not a man who was in the conference who would not admit that the whole object was to keep the other body from having a vote on the debenture proposal.

Now, I want to call attention to another phase of this question. I asked the conferees if they thought they were justified, in face of the serious situation in which agriculture finds itself, in absolutely ignoring any relief legislation on the ground that some little technicality had not been strictly observed. I said, "Do you feel that you are justified in absolutely bringing to naught an attempt to relieve the farmer because of the question as to whether or not the proper procedure has been observed in getting a vote in the House?"

It was very apparent to me that orders had been given from some source, and religiously obeyed, that this matter should not be voted upon in the House. I want to make just a few observations as to the situation which confronts us.

Before starting on that I will say that I have no way of knowing why there should have been the very remarkable coincidence that we resumed the conference at the very time the press said an agreement had been reached and that the Senate would recede. I state here and now that that is the most humiliating thing to me personally that has occurred to me in my 20 years of service in the Senate. Our conferees, taking a position as representatives of the Senate, have no right to yield on a matter on which the coordinate body has never expressed itself. Mark you, the Senate conferees were not demanding that the House accept the amendment, nor were we demanding that it stay in the bill or there would be no conference; but the House conferees were asserting not only that they would not express themselves, but that they would destroy the legislation if that provision stayed in the bill.

I want the Senate to get the full significance of the attitude of the two bodies. We were instructed by a majority vote to stand by that proposition. The House had never expressed itself even indirectly in reference to it. We thought it was of such importance in the endeavor to afford relief to distressed agriculture that we included in the bill the debenture feature, in spite of the most terrific pressure, as great pressure as was ever brought on this body, to keep it out of the bill.

I will not review the facts to prove that. They are known to all Senators. Yet, in spite of a new administration which has just come in, big with promise of relief to agriculture, having had an expression from one part of this legislative body, it was natural to suppose that every effort would be brought to bear to have that expression incorporated, as nearly as might be, but we, in earnest as to the relief that agriculture should receive, as has been so splendidly analyzed by the Senator from Nebraska, we here in debate, without regard to the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue, or without regard to the other body, in our capacity as legislators, debated the proposition up and down, analyzed it, compared, sifted, and then reached the solemn conclusion, on a roll call, that if we were to relieve agriculture even in the smallest degree, we must provide a means of immediate relief. Time is of the essence of this situation. Bankruptcy and ruin had already set in, and if we were to stay that crumbling process and encourage them and bring back hope, we had to have something that would be immediately effective.

After all the debate, in spite of all the pressure, we carried the debenture by a majority. Allow me to digress just here to say that the taunt has been thrown at us, "But you carried it by only two." I reply, "A statute on the books is just as effective once it gets there if it was carried by one as if it were carried by a hundred." But, in spite of that, we said to the House conferees, "Just take it back to your body and have an expression of the Members in view of the situation that has been depicted in reference to agriculture." They said, "No; we will have no legislation at all"—rather than vote this? No; not that. "Rather than take it back and have an expression. We are not going to do it."

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Did not the Senator from South Carolina say to me in the Senate that if the House had voted on the debenture, and had voted it down by any majority, he would have been willing to recede?

Mr. SMITH. As a matter of course, I would have been willing to recede if the great majority of that body, right from the people, after having had a full and free expression had said, "We have considered it, as you have, and by a majority we voted it down." Then I would have had some reason, some ground, based on the preponderance of wisdom of those who represent the people, as I do in part, for receding. But I did not feel that I should recede on account of the dictum of a handful of conferees, who did not have any orders from anybody but their bosses.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator said if a mere majority of the House——

Mr. SMITH. I am not going to stress that. A majority of one or two would be enough. I am talking about the right of those who represent the people to express themselves, and not be choked down by a little handful of parliamentarians and those who represent them; and the Senator from Indiana has no right to do it. He is here as the leader of the majority; and he, as a patriot, should join us and demand, on so serious a proposition, which means the life or death of agriculture, that the whole legislative body shall express itself.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator really think that the life of agriculture depends on the passage of this bill with the debenture plan in it?

Mr. SMITH. I do, and I will tell the Senator why; and I will prove by one sentence that the Senator, and those who voted against the debenture plan, do not intend ever to help the farmer. The amendment provided that the debenture plan should not be invoked until and unless any commodity which bore a tariff received less than half of the benefits of the tariff. The debenture amendment would simply insure that the motion made should be at least a half lick, if not a whole lick. But the Senator says, "No; we are not going to write into the bill any kind of assurance that the farmer shall get anything except what we wrote, just a mere motion." The Senator knows, just as well as he knows anything, that the farmer never can get the benefit of a tariff, in the condition in which he finds himself, without any bargaining power, without any organization, without any reserve fund, millions of them, through poverty and necessity, competing in the market places to get some return for their labor. He knows that without the intervention of the strong arm of the Government, taking the place of the strong arm of organizations and trusts and combinations, he will never get relief.

The debenture amendment simply provided that we would guarantee the farmers one-half of the tariff in case this abortion, this motion, this shadow, that we were putting up, which might work some time in the future, should be enacted; that is, if your sons and daughters are too poor to go to the cities or somewhere else, and will be compelled to farm, in the future it may do them some good. We say to the farmers through the debenture, "If one-half of the promise made you is not made good, just go down to the customhouse, where the great wall is put up that guarantees to manufacturers anywhere from 15 to 100 per cent, go there with your export paper and get out of that fund what that paper entitles you to." I do not know who wrote the debenture provision, but the man who wrote it knew a great deal about operation of the tariff. He provided that recourse should be made to the right place, to the customhouse, the great door that shuts out from the farmers relief from foreign countries.

I have a brother who bought a suit of clothes at an establishment in London, came right back to Norfolk, walked into a tailor's shop, and the tailor happened to have identically the same pattern, I suppose made by the same English house. The suit in Norfolk cost him a little over twice as much as the identical suit bought in England.

We all know, every agriculturist here knows, every farmer knows, that nine-tenths of the evils from which the farmers are now suffering are the direct result of the enormous prices, as a result of the imposition of a tariff, the farmer has to pay for what he gets.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. When did my friend discover that the debenture was essential to the salvation of agriculture?

Mr. SMITH. When I saw that the farmers were absolutely being crucified by high protection, and that it looked as if there was no hope ever to get the American people to understand that they must change administrations if they wanted to change their condition. I want to answer the Senator specifically. I am fundamentally and hereditarily and historically a Democrat. In the name of God, if I can go so far as to relinquish my Democratic principles to the extent of voting for a tariff to relieve those who are dying by virtue of the imposition of the tariff on what they have to buy, surely such an apostle of the tariff as the Senator could meet me half way and grant this boon, which action would do no violence to his conscience, even if it does to mine.

Mr. WATSON. Let me continue the question.

Mr. SMITH. I wish the Senator would.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator has made such a long answer that I can not follow my question.

Mr. SMITH. I say that the Senator, as a high-tariff man, has less reason to vote against the debenture than I, a free-trade man, or a tariff-for-revenue man, have, and if I can afford, in the distressed condition of agriculture, to forego for the time being my principles of Democracy in order to relieve the farmer, surely the Senator could extend his principles of Republicanism, and do it freely and willingly and in accordance with his platform.

Mr. WATSON. I will answer that by making the assertion that there is no relation between the debenture and the tariff.

Mr. SMITH. No; not a bit when one applies to the farmer and the other to the manufacturer, but if it were turned right around and the debenture applied to industry, the Senator would vote for it right now.

Mr. WATSON. Oh, no; I would not.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator knows it. There is no use to split hairs in this way.

Mr. WATSON. Let me continue my question after the Senator gets through with his imprecation. The Senator said he discovered in the last little while that the debenture plan was essential to the life of agriculture. Was it mentioned in the campaign by a solitary soul in the world?

Mr. SMITH. Oh, Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON. Wait a minute! Let me ask the question. Did the Republican convention mention it? Did the Republican platform mention it? Did the Republican candidate mention it? Did the Democratic platform mention it? Did the Democratic candidate mention it? Did the Senator from South Carolina mention it? Was there a solitary soul anywhere in the whole campaign who said the debenture plan was essential to the salvation of agriculture in the whole campaign? Let me finish the question.

Mr. SMITH. I want to answer that much of it.

Mr. WATSON. All right; answer it.

Mr. SMITH. Does the Senator pretend to tell me that he is not going to legislate, no matter what condition may be revealed here, if he is not able to find that it was specifically set forth in the platform?

Mr. WATSON. Will the Senator let me answer that question?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. Here is the situation: The Republicans adopted a platform. The candidate stood on that platform and made speeches in line with the declarations of the platform.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Where did the Senator get that information?

Mr. WATSON. From all the speeches made by Mr. Hoover. Every one of them was in entire harmony and in perfect consonance with the platform declarations of the Republican Party, and I challenge the Senator or any other man to show one dissonant note between the platform and the declarations of the candidate for the Presidency.

Furthermore, I want to say to my friend that the bill without the debenture plan is in exact harmony with the declarations of the platform and the declarations of Mr. Hoover as the candidate, and during all that time the Senator from South Carolina knew just as well as he knows anything, and being a wise man he knows a lot of things, that the Republican candidate was going to win and that the platform would be the platform upon which he would act and that his declarations would be the declarations that would be put into a bill, and yet during all that time he made no outcry that the debenture plan was essential to the salvation of agriculture in the Republic. Is not that true?

Mr. SMITH. Oh, no.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ALLEN in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to have the Senator from Indiana point to a single item in the bill outside of the debenture plan that redeems the pledge made by Mr. Hoover in the speech from which the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] quoted wherein Mr. Hoover said he would use his influence to give the farmer the benefit of the tariff. Where is the provision in this bill that will do that?

Mr. WATSON. Every platform declaration made and every speech made by Mr. Hoover on the platform are in exact harmony. The bill is designed to carry out that principle.

Mr. NORRIS. But I am asking the Senator to take the bill and point out a single sentence that does it.

Mr. WATSON. Every sentence in it does it, with this exception, I will say to the Senator, and he and I do not disagree about it, that where there is a surplus crop the tariff is not effective.

Mr. NORRIS. And Mr. Hoover said he was going to make it effective, and I ask the Senator now, in all fairness, to take the bill and point out a sentence that does it.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator mean that when candidate Hoover made that declaration he had the debenture plan in mind? Does the Senator from Nebraska mean that?

Mr. NORRIS. No. The Senator from Nebraska was not fooled, but there were hundreds of thousands of men all over the country, and some of them are in the Senate to-day, who were fooled by that statement. I said at the time, "You are not specific enough." He promised to make the tariff, if he could, effective to the farmer. He was going to take care of the surplus. He did not say how. That is what I challenged in the campaign. I said, "Be specific. Tell us how you are going to do it," and men like the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] and other Senators said, "Why, no; we will take his promise. He is going to do it in some way." They criticized me because I said I wanted something concrete. Now we have something here that everybody concedes will give the farmer the benefit of one-half of the tariff, and the Senator says Mr. Hoover has not agreed to do that particular thing. If his pledge is good, if he meant what he said, then if this bill does not do it let him give us something that will do it that is not in the bill. I challenge any man to point out any provision in the bill that does do that thing.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I want to second what the Senator from Nebraska has said. If the Senator from Indiana, or anybody he represents, will bring forward a proposition or an amendment that will do just what was promised in the platform I would like to have it done. I am not asking him even to consider the platform. The Senator from Indiana does not know what is in it, but even if he did he would pay no attention to it. He never has, and nobody else ever has.

Mr. WATSON. That is a very idle declaration, and the Senator ought not to make it.

Mr. SMITH. I know it is true and everybody knows it is true. I want to join the Senator from Nebraska in his challenge to those who oppose the debenture plan to point out in the bill where there is a single line, paragraph, provision, or section that promises any sort of relief outside of the mere authorization of $500,000,000, which could not under the present law be made operative right now.

Mr. WATSON. I will give my view briefly, which is that the $500,000,000 taken, as provided in the bill, by an organization properly officered and properly constituted, after a time will work out in the United States to build up a great agricultural-manufacturing industry in America. I do not say that anybody can wave a wand and cure the ills of agriculture. While I advocated the equalization fee as vigorously as any man here, I never believed it would at once cure the ills of agriculture. I thought that over a series of years it would be wonderfully helpful. I think the provisions of this bill, if worked out in accordance with the views and the desires of the President of the United States, will cure the ills of agriculture, but not in a day.

The series of questions I began to ask the Senator were revolving around the one question as to when he began to advocate the debenture? It was never dreamed of until it was brought up here. There was not a soul ever mentioned it, but all at once, like a flash from the clear sky, came the idea that the debenture plan is essential to save agriculture. When did it come?

Mr. SMITH. It is nothing but another expression of the equalization fee, only a little better.

Mr. WATSON. Oh no!

Mr. SMITH. In my own time I will answer the Senator.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator say to me in all seriousness that he distinguishes no difference between the equalization fee and the debenture plan?

Mr. SMITH. There is, and I will give the Senator the distinction.

Mr. WATSON. There is a distinction, of course.

Mr. SMITH. The equalization fee placed back the load on the poor devil of a farmer and the debenture plan loads it on all the people. The debenture plan is better than the equalization fee. The Senator did vote for the equalization fee, and I suspect now that he did it because he thought the poor devil who bears all the other burdens would have the equalization fee loaded on him, but here we propose to eliminate it specifically from his shoulder and let it be borne by all the people like some other burdens; and the Senator is protesting against it.

Mr. WATSON. I am against it for two reasons: First, because it is a direct subsidy and I am opposed to subsidies, and the Senator has been, too; secondly, if I was going to give the farmer a direct subsidy, I would do it directly through the tariff. If I was going into the Treasury and give him a direct subsidy, I would do it through a tariff that would give it all to him and not only half of it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, did the Senator vote for the ship subsidy bill?

Mr. WATSON. I do not believe I was in Congress then.

Mr. HARRISON. O Mr. President, the Senator was one of the great champions of the Harding administration that brought it here.

Mr. SMITH. This colloquy is getting rather confused.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I make the point of order that Senators are out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. I asked a question of the Senator from South Carolina, but it has not been answered.

Mr. SMITH. I think if the Senator would answer satisfactorily the question why he voted for the ship subsidy in view of the fact that the shipowners are so poor and have no resources as compared to the farmer, then I could answer his question. I can see no reason why he would favor such a terribly depressed group as that.

Mr. WATSON. I can answer that question.

Mr. SMITH. I know it. I know my friend from Indiana and he knows——

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator believe that the railroads in the shipment of goods abroad should be permitted to charge a less rate than upon those which are shipped in this country for local consumption?

Mr. WATSON. I do not. I believe in uinform rates for all purposes on the railroads. Does that answer the question?

Mr. HARRISON. That is what is being done to-day.

Mr. WATSON. I did not do it!

Mr. SMITH. But the House brought up as one of the cardinal reasons against any discussion of the debenture plan the idea that it was against the request of the President. I understand the President has requested this lowering of rates on certain agricultural products, and now the Senator is getting in the pseudo class.

Mr. WATSON. Oh, no; I am not. I am straight all the time.

The VICE PRESIDENT (rapping for order). Senators must address the Chair and obtain permission before interrupting the Senator having the floor.

Mr. SMITH. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. We have gotten into a good-natured colloquy here, but I have not heard the Senator from South Carolina say when he came to the conclusion that the debenture plan was essential to the salvation of agriculture.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to have the Senator from South Carolina ask the Senator from Indiana what that has to do with this proposition anyway? What difference does it make when the Senator from South Carolina became favorable to the debenture plan? If the Senator from Indiana is opposed to the debenture plan and still wants to give the farmer the benefit of the tariff, and does not want to do it by way of the debenture plan, why not ask him to propose an amendment that will do it? In other words, instead of being destructive, let me suggest to the Senator from Indiana that he use some statesmanship and give us a constructive proposition that will redeem the promise of the party and the pledge of the candidate.

Mr. SMITH. Oh, the Senator from Nebraska does not want to strain the mentality of my good friend from Indiana by asking him to be constructive. I want to answer that question, although, of course, I know it is not germane; it has nothing whatever to do with the question at issue as to whether we, as a self-respecting body, should demand that legislation which we in part indorse shall at least have an expression from those who coordinate with us and who are responsible with us for legislation. One reason why I am in favor of the debenture plan is because the condition of agriculture is such that we have got to apply some of the poison to remove the poison which has been injected into it by the high prices resulting from the operations of the tariff.

Mr. President, I want to make one further observation which to me gives the real attitude of the party in power toward agriculture. The expression has gone out all over the country that we must not disturb the present wonderful national prosperity. Actually there was recently published in one of the papers in this city a statement to the effect that the hope was that the conferees would not confuse this matter and by virtue of failure to enact some sort of farm legislation, jeopardize the wonderful prosperity of the country. Let us take the logic of that situation as applied to the present administration and the present party in power.

There are 38,000,000 American citizens now engaged in agriculture. So desperate and horrible was the condition of the farmers that it was thought necessary to call an extraordinary session to secure farm relief; yet mark the distinction which was drawn between farm relief and national prosperity. The condition of agriculture was a matter that, perhaps, ought to have some attention; but it must not be so attended to as to jeopardize "national prosperity." The logic of that is that agricultural interests are not considered as a part and parcel of the national concern and welfare. It is stated on the same page by the same newspaper that we ought to have agricultural relief, but that we ought not so to discuss it as to jeopardize national prosperity. If the 38,000,000 citizens of this country who are bankrupt and ruined do not spell a part of the national welfare, if that be the attitude of those in power, we can understand why they are willing to jeopardize any legislation, whether because of the debenture amendment or otherwise.

Mr. President, I wish to repeat what I have said heretofore that, so far as I am concerned as one of the conferees on the part of the Senate, I would be willing to accede to the conference report, if the necessity arose—as in that event it would—if the coordinate branch of the Congress would express itself, as we have done, by a roll call or other vote, on the debenture plan; but I am not willing, the Senate having expressed itself as a coordinate branch of the Legislature touching a matter that is so very vital to agriculture, that through manipulation under certain rules at the other end of the Capitol, the Members of the other coordinate body who wish to express themselves, should be denied that opportunity, and those who do not want to express themselves on this proposition should be favored.

I knew, from the time we met in the conference room until the day we walked out, that the powers that be at both ends of the Capitol were determined that the House should not have an opportunity to express itself. I do not believe that a Member of the Senate conference committee believed that an argument which was worthy of the notice of a moron was advanced by the conferees of the other House as a reason why they should not carry the debenture proposition back to the House of Representatives. I, for one, feel that the Members of this body, regardless of whether they favor the debenture amendment or not, should insist that the body at the other end of the Capitol, which has the same responsibility as have we, shall express themselves on this vital matter.

Mr. HEFLIN obtained the floor.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HEFLIN. Not now.

Mr. President, Senators will recall that when the debenture plan was under consideration in the outset the newspapers were full of statements to the effect that the House would not consider it even if the Senate should incorporate it in the farm relief bill. The Senate, one of the coordinate branches of the National Legislature, was told in advance just what it could do and could not do. After due consideration the Senate decided that the debenture amendment was not a revenue-raising proposition; that it was sound and would do what we were seeking to do—afford relief to the distressed farmers of the country. The Senate, by a solemn vote, put the debenture provision into the bill. The bill containing the debenture amendment then went to the House of Representatives for consideration; but days and weeks have gone by, and the House has not as yet had an opportunity to pass upon the question. The House of Representatives has virtually done what it said it would do in regard to the debenture proposal. The Senate has been flouted and insulted by that action.

Why does not the Senate have a right to ask that the House vote on this question? Senators have voted on it; a roll call has been had; the people back in the States know how their Representatives in the Senate stand on this question; but it seems that there are some political agencies at work which are providing a "city of refuge" for Members of the House who must again run for election next year; so that they may be able to stand out of the storm and say, "I never had a chance to vote on the debenture; I would have voted for it," or "I would have voted against it."

Mr. President, I submit that such a course is inexcusable; it is indefensible. No responsible statesmanship would countenance such procedure. The American people have a right to know how their Representatives stand. The Representatives who want to vote on this question have a right to vote on it; and those who do not want to vote on it, but who want to dodge a vote, ought to be forced to vote on it. At least, the Senate has the right to insist that the other body pass on the proposition before we act any further on it, except to reject the conference report.

I appreciate the fight which was made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] in behalf of the debenture plan. It seems that they were the only two members of the conference committee who did fight for it. The other conferees on the part of the Senate, it appears, were mild-mannerredly acquiescent in what the House conferees wanted to do; and when the final showdown came they went over to them, and not one of them shed a single tear, but, with a smile on their faces, they acquiesced in the decision of the House conferees.

They come back to us with a bill from which the debenture plan has been extracted; and, as a further slap in the face of the Senate, the House voted on the conference report yesterday before the Senate could have an opportunity to say a word upon the subject. When will the Senate assert itself and stand up for its own rights and its own dignity? Mr. President, if Senators will not stand up now for the rights of the Senate, I do not know how long it will be before the Senate will be merely a "me, too," body for the House.

I do not want to be discourteous to the House; I have a very affectionate regard for the House, for I served in it for a number of years; but I think the House and the Senate ought to treat each other with mutual respect and consideration; and it is as much the duty of one as it is of the other to be considerate and courteous. I would not want the Senate to turn down the House in any such fashion as this, and I do not think the House has the right to do what it has done in this instance. The fact of the matter is that it is not the House itself which has done it; it is the conferees and the powers that be over there who are shielding a large block of Members. It may be that the Members of that block desire to be shielded, and in saying that it is not the House that has done it; I mean that the House has not had a chance to vote on the question. I want the House to have an opportunity to vote on it, and I am going to see to it, so far as I can, that the House shall have an opportunity to vote on it.

The Senate ought to reject the conference report; it ought to send it back to the House, and then let the Members of that body who are coming up for reelection next year take the responsibility of killing farm relief legislation. When anyone undertakes to say that the Senate will be responsible, that is not true. Let the House act—it can do so in an hour—and if the House votes out the debenture plan, then we can take further action here; but, Mr. President, those who favor the debenture plan, and who want real farm relief, are not going to permit this thing to be "put over" until the House has had a chance to express itself upon the subject. The Senate is within its rights, the Senate is doing its solemn duty, when it insists that the House shall vote upon the debenture plan, and, Mr. President, I shall insist by my vote that that course be pursued.

In 1922, as I recall, I helped in the filibuster to defeat the ship subsidy bill. The majority on the Republican side were ready to pass it, and had the votes to pass it, if those opposed to the measure had given them an opportunity to vote on it. It was provided in that measure that private interests might buy for $200,000,000 ships which cost the United States $3,000,000,000, involving a loss of $2,800,000,000 to the Government. It also provided that the Shipping Trust could borrow money from the Treasury at 2 per cent. The Republican majority were not opposed to a subsidy then, but they turn a deaf ear now, when we are asking them to give the debenture plan to the farmers of the Nation, who are losing their homes and farms, who have been driven by the hundreds of thousands, and now up into the millions, away from the farm into the industrial centers, who are out of money and out of work, helpless and almost hopeless in the world. When we ask the Republican majority to come to the rescue of the farmers, to give them a helping hand, then they rise up and say, "We are against the debenture or a subsidy in any form." I insist that they shall take the responsibility of defeating this legislation, and they have got to take it. Let the House, if it wants to, vote on the debenture; but we can not permit the carrying out of this little monkey-wrench scheme of politics which has been concocted to allow the conferees to stand between the House and the Senate. This issue must be met in the open, and the people who are reading the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and studying the situation here, will know, when it is all over, who was on the side of the farmer and who was trying to fool and betray the farmer.

INTERNATIONAL RED CROSS CONVENTION AT GENEVA

Mr. McNARY obtained the floor.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. From the Committee on Appropriations I desire to report back favorably six separate appropriation bills, of greater or lesser consequence. They are of such a nature that I think it will only take a few moments to consider and act upon them, and I shall be glad to have them passed.

First, from the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 86) making an appropriation for the International Red Cross and Prisoners of War Conference at Geneva, Switzerland, in 1929. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, let me inquire of the Senator how much money is carried by the joint resolution?

Mr. WARREN. The joint resolution provides an appropriation of $34,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I shall not object, but I wish to say a word regarding the joint resolution. About 10 years ago we stopped appropriations of this character proposing to send delegations to Europe at the expense of the Government. It is claimed that the particular convention in this instance is a Red Cross convention, but it is now 10 years after the World War, and if we are going to continue sending delegates to Red Cross conventions, it will mean $34,000 annually merely to enable some individuals to take trips to Europe. I think we ought to stop such things. As I have said, I am not going to oppose the joint resolution; the appropriation proposed is authorized by an act of Congress, and I think that it received Budget approval, but hereafter, when these bills come here to send delegations to Europe, to Geneva, to Rome, to Naples, and to other places, we ought to stop this practice, and save the taxpayers the money that is required to send these people across to Europe.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I shall not differ with my friend as to the future; but the present bill simply fulfills the law.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I am not going to object to the passage of this joint resolution; but I am going to take advantage of this opportunity to refer briefly to a letter from the vice chairman of the American Red Cross, Mr. Fieser. He went down into Arkansas where, according to their own report, 850 families have been driven from their homes by floods and are utterly destitute. The organization said to them, "A similar flood came last year, and this one came this year, and another one may come next year. Therefore you ought to get out somewhere else and abandon your homes and try to find something else to do to make a living." In other words, they refuse to extend any aid to one who has been stricken by a great misfortune simply because it happened to come once before.

The policy is so utterly out of harmony with what the Red Cross has been, and what it is believed to be by people who contribute to it, and it is such an outrageous doctrine to announce that a man having two misfortunes is not entitled to any relief at all, that I merely wanted to call attention to it when the Red Cross is coming here for money to take a trip to Europe.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the sum of $34,000 is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to remain available until June 30, 1930, for the expenses of participation by the United States in the International Conference for the Revision of the Geneva Convention of July 6, 1906, for the amelioration of the condition of the wounded in the armies in the field; and for the study of the Revision of the Code for Prisoners of War adopted at The Hague in 1907, to be held at Geneva, Switzerland, in July, 1929, including travel and subsistence or per diem in lieu of subsistence (notwithstanding the provisions of any other act), compensation of employees, stenographic and other services by contract if deemed necessary, rent of office, purchase of necessary books and documents, printing and binding, official cards, and such other expenses as may be authorized by the Secretary of State.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXTENSION TO POST-OFFICE BUILDING, CORINTH, MISS.

Mr. WARREN. From the Committee on Appropriations, I report back favorably, without amendment, House Joint Resolution 88, making an additional appropriation for the extension to the post-office building at Corinth, Miss.; and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $876.04 for the purpose of providing granite entrance steps for the extention to the post-office building at Corinth, Miss., authorized by the first deficiency act, fiscal year 1928, approved December 22, 1927. Such amount shall be in addition to all other amounts heretofore appropriated for the extension of such post-office building.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MUNICIPAL CENTER IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. WARREN. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably, without amendment, House Joint Resolution 97, making appropriations toward carrying out the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the establishment of a municipal center in the District of Columbia," approved February 28, 1929; and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I inquire whether this joint resolution ought not to go to the Committee on the District of Columbia?

Mr. WARREN. The joint resolution provides that the money shall be paid out of the surplus revenues of the District of Columbia.

Mr. KING. Three million dollars?

Mr. WARREN. Three million dollars. Ten thousand dollars of it is made available for early use.

Mr. KING. The inquiry I made was whether or not this joint resolution should be considered by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator from Utah I may say that the bill authorizing this appropriation was considered, as I understand, by the Committee on the District of Columbia at the last session of Congress and was passed by the Congress. So the bill has been considered by that committee, has been passed by the Congress, and this is the normal course of events; the appropriation for it is now being made available.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. This measure is merely to carry out existing law, as I understand.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The law authorizing this appropriation was passed upon and reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I knew that the matter had been before the District Committee, but I was not sure whether it had been definitely agreed that $3,000,000 should be appropriated for this purpose.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Connecticut whether the city bears any part of the expense at all?

Mr. BINGHAM. It comes entirely out of city funds, money now in the Treasury to the credit of the District of Columbia. None of it is Federal money.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, let the joint resolution go over until Monday. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be placed on the calendar.

JUDGMENTS OF VARIOUS UNITED STATES COURTS

Mr. WARREN. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably, without amendment, House bill 3663, making appropriations for the payment of certain judgments rendered against the Government by various United States courts, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

S. C. p. 900, sec. 288).

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TURTLE MOUNTAIN INDIAN RESERVATION, N. DAK.

Mr. WARREN. From the Committee on Appropriations, I report back favorably, without amendment, House Joint Resolution 93, amending an appropriation for a consolidated school at Belcourt, within the Turtle Mountain Indian Reservation, N. Dak., and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the provision in the second deficiency act approved March 4, 1929 (Pub. No. 1035), making an appropriation for a consolidated day school at Belcourt within the Turtle Mountain Indian Reservation, N. Dak., is amended to read as follows:

"Turtle Mountain Reservation, N. Dak.: For construction and equipment, including not to exceed $5,000 for motor busses, of a consolidated day school at Belcourt, within the Turtle Mountain Indian Reservation, N. Dak., fiscal years 1929 and 1930, $125,000: Provided, That such school shall be open for attendance by white children and by restricted or nonrestricted Indian children resident within said reservation if and when the State tuition fund and the county tuition fund, which would otherwise be paid to school districts in said reservation, if functioning, and the proceeds of the usual school levy in the said school districts, shall be paid to the United States to be used to supplement Government appropriations for the maintenance and operation of said consolidated school and for the payment of tuition of any white and Indian children, restricted or unrestricted, residing within said reservation in any high school approved by the superintendent of the Turtle Mountain Agency."

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

UNITED STATES PULASKI SESQUICENTENNIAL COMMISSION

Mr. WARREN. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably, without amendment, House Joint Resolution 91, to provide for the payment of certain expenses of the United States Pulaski Sesquicentennial Commission; and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That for expenses of the United States Pulaski Sesquicentennial Commission created by Public Resolution No. 86, Seventieth Congress, approved February 16, 1929, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,500, to remain available until June 30, 1930, for the payment of such expenditures as may be necessary and incident to the duties of the commission, including stationery and office supplies, compensation of a secretary, traveling expenses, and for subsistence expenses of the members of the commission and the secretary when traveling on official business at such rate per diem as the commission may determine.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SAMOAN GROUP OF ISLANDS

Mr. BINGHAM. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably, without amendment, House Joint Resolution 83, to make available funds for carrying into effect the public resolution of February 20, 1929, as amended, concerning the cessions of certain islands of the Samoan group to the United States, and I submit a report (No. 29) thereon.

I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution; and I call the attention of the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I understand that this joint resolution is to carry out an authorization heretofore made.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is true, Mr. President.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have no objection to its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That for carrying into effect the provisions of Public Resolution No. 89, Seventieth Congress, entitled "Joint resolution to provide for accepting, ratifying, and confirming the cessions of certain islands of the Samoan group to the United States, and for other purposes," approved February 20, 1929, as amended, there is hereby made available until expended the sum of $25,000, from the unobligated balance of the continuing appropriation "naval emergency fund," Navy Department, to be expended in the discretion of the President by such agency or agencies as he may direct.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INVESTIGATION OF COMMUNICATION SERVICES

Mr. DENEEN. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably, as amended by the Committee on Interstate Commerce, Senate Resolution 80, to investigate certain matters relating to power and communications in interstate and foreign commerce, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Committee on Interstate Commerce will be stated.

The amendment was, on page 2, line 7, after the word "interstate," to insert "and foreign," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is hereby authorized and directed to (1) investigate the relationship existing between the different kinds of communication services used in interstate and foreign commerce, including radio, telephone, telegraph, and all kinds of wireless and cable services so used, and transmission of power by wire or wireless; (2) to investigate the connection, relationship, and ownership and control of corporations and persons engaged in carrying on interstate and foreign communication services and to investigate their trade practices and trade activities, including contracts and stock ownership; and (3) to investigate any and all other connections, relationships, and activities of persons or corporations engaged in interstate and foreign communications by either wire or wireless, as the committee may deem necessary.

The committee is hereby authorized and directed to make the aforesaid investigations for the purpose of reporting legislation to the Senate for the purpose of controlling and regulating interstate and foreign commerce by radio, telephone, telegraph, and/or any or all other form or forms of communication or transmission of power by either wire or wireless.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate until the final report is submitted, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, and to take such testimony and make such expenditures as it deems advisable. Every person who, having been summoned as a witness by authority of said committee or any subcommittee thereof, willfully makes default or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any question pertinent to the investigation herein authorized shall be liable to the penalties provided by section 102 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee or subcommittee, which shall not exceed $15,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. McNARY. I am advised that there will be no further debate on the pending conference report this afternoon. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate take a recess until Monday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Monday, June 10, 1929, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SATURDAY, June 8, 1929

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

In this sacred stillness, blessed Lord, let the calmness of Thy Holy Spirit quiet us like a holy incense. Thou who art the best coming to the worst, be with us. Make us a little better and a little bigger for this day. Urge the truth of Him who bore the stainless shield into all our hearts. Remember us, O Mighty One, for we need Thee. The years, the years, sit lightly, sit lightly upon us, and may we never lose the dauntless cheer of youthhood. Ever hold us, O God, with our earthborn faces against Thy radiant light. Through Christ our Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

HISTORICAL CELEBRATION AT NEW BERN, N. C.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following communication:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 8, 1929.

Hon. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH,
Speaker of the House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: During the Seventieth Congress you were kind enough to appoint me as a member of the commission to attend the historical celebration at New Bern, N. C., on June 11.

I regret very much that matters have arisen which will prevent me from attending the celebration, and I therefore desire to tender my resignation as a member of the commission.

Respectfully yours,

AUG. H. ANDRESEN.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation will be accepted; and pursuant to House Concurrent Resolution 60 of the Seventieth Congress, the Chair appoints the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THATCHER] to take the place of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDRESEN].

FLAG DAY ADDRESS

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an address of my own upon a Flag Day occasion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an address delivered by himself. Is there objection?

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address which I delivered at the Flag Day exercises, June 14, 1922, on the steps of the United States Capitol in connection with a program in charge of the District Grand Army of the Republic and allied organizations.

The address is as follows:

"Uncover when the flag goes by, boys,
'Tis freedom's starry banner that you greet;
Flag, that's famed in song and story,
Long may it wave, Old Glory,
The flag that has never known defeat."

One hundred and forty-five years ago to-day Congress, by formal resolution, decreed that the flag of the 13 United States be 13 stripes, alternate red and white, and that the Union be 13 white stars in a blue field. In 1794, when the number of States had increased to 15, it was voted that two additional stripes and two additional stars should be added. The flag retained this form until the conclusion of the War of 1812. In 1818 the addition of new States, with the consequent addition of stripes, made it evident that if this plan of enlargement was continued, the flag would speedily become unwieldy and ill proportioned. On March 31, of 1818, Congress passed an act establishing the flag of the United States. This act directed that the flag be made up of 13 horizontal stripes, alternating red and white, and that the blue field should carry a white star for each State in the Union. For 104 years, therefore, the flag has retained this form, changing only as new stars have been added on the 4th of July following the admission of the new States.

The names of Betsy Ross and George Washington are inseparably associated with the making of the first flag, and almost countless stories and traditions are handed down as to its origin. Its name of "Old Glory" is accredited to William Driver, a Massachusetts sailor, who, upon being presented with the flag to fly from the masthead of his brig, christened it "Old Glory." It was first unfurled in battle at Cooch's Bridge, near Newark, Del., during the Revolutionary struggle, and a fine monument marks this significant event. The decisive Battle of Saratoga, in the same war, saw the flag in general use by the American forces. It is not improbable that a large measure of the credit for this splendid victory may be attributed to the fact that the new flag, flying for the first time over the heads of the heroic followers of Gates and Schuyler, symbolized the new feeling of national unity hitherto but feebly sensed by the colonists.

The brief time allotted for these remarks is, of course, too short to attempt in any detail the marvelous story which history unfolds in this chosen land, where for nearly a century and a half this beautiful banner has been the symbol of a free Government for and by a free people. It is not extravagant, however, to say that it speaks in tones that are heard around the world and that it symbolizes a power and prestige little dreamed of in the years when it was first unfurled to the hopeful and courageous band who had dedicated themselves to the great cause of independence and who had mutually pledged to each other their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor.

It is especially fitting that in view of our Nation's wonderful achievements and marvelous advancement, since the adoption of the flag, we should pause for a brief time to mark this anniversary occasion with appropriate ceremony and to renew our pledge of devotion to it and to the country for which it stands. To-day in a thousand public gatherings and in thousands of public schools, hearts have been stirred as exercises appropriate to the day have been rendered. May I describe one, typical of these thousands of school exercises, that it was my privilege to witness? It took place in a small district school in connection with eighth grade graduating exercises. Six little people participated, each in turn representing one of the other great nations of the world. Each recited a brief tribute to the land he represented and as he did so, waved its flag enthusiastically with his left hand. When all had spoken, at a signal, all the flags came down and up went the Stars and Stripes in their right hands, and six clear voices sang out the real sentiment of their hearts:

"There are many flags in many lands,
There are flags of every hue;
But there is no flag in any land
Like our own Red, White, and Blue."

Simple, do I hear you say? Yes; but wondrously significant. You will be glad to know that one of these fine boys followed the flag overseas in 1918 and had a splendid part in winning that great victory. Who shall say but that the dedication of his life to the service of his country made by this young soldier lad and millions like him does not trace back to the inspiration gained from this simple school or public exercises in honor of the flag.

Of a truth it may be said that the American flag flies before all the world with a meaning closely akin to that which it holds for every citizen of the United States. To the world citizen who thinks in terms of the tangible and practical affairs of life it typifies a land of wondrous resource, of wealth almost to the point of embarrassment, of achievement unparalleled, and of prospects that challenge the imagination. To him who thinks in terms of character it symbolizes an acknowledged world leadership. In terms of power its Army and its Navy have met and matched the best the world has produced. Let the stirring words of Grantland Rice speak from the battle fields of France:

THE BIG THREE DOWN THE FIELD

"The old Tricolor swings to the right,
To the left the Union Jack;
And a new flag comes to the smashing fight
To drive for the next attack.
A flag that has guarded a stainless shield;
A banner of stripes and stars.
And now—when the bugle has once more pealed,
Now—when the three start down the field,
God pity the trench that bars.

"The old Tricolor is dripping red,
And so is the Union Jack.
But a new flag comes to the work ahead
To start for the next attack.
A flag that was never known to stop
At the end of a testing fray;
And now—wherever the shells may drop;
Now—when the three go over the top,
God pity the trench at bay."

As the flag speaks with a new eloquence to the whole world, so likewise does it speak to every loyal citizen of America. It speaks of justice, of opportunity, of privilege, of free institutions, of duty, of responsibility, of accomplishments that challenge at once the wonder and admiration of the world and of a genius and spirit that permits no boundary to be set to its progress. Small wonder then that our hearts are stirred with deep emotion as we gaze on the beautiful colors of the flag and join in this service in its honor.

The day will lose its chiefest significance, however, unless there is renewed in the heart of every citizen a dedication of himself to all that the flag represents. No finer pledge has been penned than the American's Creed by Hon. William Tyler Page: "I believe in the United States of America as a Government of the people, by the people, for the people; whose just powers are derived from the consent of the governed; a democracy in a Republic; a sovereign Nation of many sovereign States; a perfect Union, one and inseparable; established upon those principles of freedom, equality, justice, and humanity for which American patriots sacrificed their lives and fortunes.

"I therefore believe it is my duty to my country to love it, to support its Constitution, to obey its laws, to respect its flag, and to defend it against all enemies."

As the curtains of night fall on this anniversary day which marks a new world place for our flag and a new acknowledgment of our undisputed power and position, may not the words of one of our poets aptly phrase the innermost feeling of every loyal heart and appropriately close the day with patriotic benediction:

"This land of the free is for thee—
Live in it, love in it, work in it, weep in it,
Laugh in it, sing in it, die in it, sleep in it—
For it's free and for thee and for me.
The fairest and rarest that man ever trod,
The dearest and sweetest 'twixt the sky and the sod;
And it's mine and it's thine—thank God."

ADDRESS BY HON. MARVIN JONES, OF TEXAS

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleague [Mr. MCKEOWN] I ask unanimous consent to extend the remarks of our colleague from Texas [Mr. JONES] delivered over the radio last night.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma, on behalf of his colleague [Mr. MCKEOWN], asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing an address delivered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] over the radio. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MCKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I call attention to the splendid and enlightening address of my colleague Hon. MARVIN JONES, of Texas, delivered over the nation-wide radio hook-up on the evening of June 7.

This address is of great interest to all persons who have given and are giving thought to the difficult problem of farm relief.

It is a great pleasure to pay a tribute to MARVIN JONES, who is one of the outstanding men in Congress who for the past six years have given their best thought to the farm problem. He is the author of the measure for developing new uses and outlets for cotton, and has continuously worked for the development of the great Southwest.

He is the pioneer, the originator in Congress of the farm debenture plan, which has for its purpose the placing of agricultural products on a price equality with manufactured products.

Mr. JONES is a fighter who never gives up. He urged this plan to his colleagues in the House when he and his followers were in the minority, and it is greatly to his credit that the Senate attached his debenture plan to the farm relief bill when that measure first passed that body.

I therefore commend to the attention of all those who are interested in farm relief this address which follows:

THE NATION'S PROBLEM

I am glad to join with the National Grange and its able master, L. J. Taber, in conveying greetings to its vast membership throughout the Union.

The Grange is conservative. It indulges in no idle gossip. It does not indorse any half-baked ideas. When it speaks, therefore, it speaks with a power that no radical organization could possess.

As individuals we live in different sections of the country and are influenced to some extent by our local economic conditions. But there are certain great basic things that are as broad as the sweep of the Nation. The application of these principles is the same anywhere under the flag.

THE GREAT ESSENTIAL

The greatest of all fundamentals in a free government is equality. The great essential in the life of a democracy is that its citizens should receive equal treatment in the application of its laws.

The producer of surplus crops does not have this equality under existing tariff laws. To correct this discrimination the Grange has indorsed the debenture plan as a part of the tariff system.

Stated in simple terms, the effect of the debenture is to take a part of what the Federal Government collects in tariff duties on foreign goods brought into this country and with that fund to pay an export premium or bounty on wheat and other surplus commodities which are shipped out of this country. Its purpose is to make the tariff effective on products of the farm and ranch, just as it is now effective on manufactured articles.

THE WHEAT SURPLUS

For illustration, let us assume the existence of a surplus of wheat which must be shipped abroad. The exporter, whether farmer, cooperative association, or other person, would receive from the United States Treasury a certificate showing the fact and the amount of such shipment abroad. This certificate would be known as an export debenture. It would be accepted by the Government in payment of any import duty on any commodity whatever coming into this country. The value of the certificate would be 21 cents for every bushel of wheat exported. It would be negotiable and could be used directly or sold to any importer who could use the debenture at its full face value in payment of the customs duties on any goods which he brings from the outside into America. The plan would operate in a similar manner on all other surplus farm commodities.

PRICE INCREASE

Its immediate effect would be to increase the price of all wheat in America 20 cents per bushel, which would mean millions by way of increased prices to the wheat growers of the United States. It would add 2 cents per pound to the price of cotton, which would mean millions in increased prices to the cotton growers of the South and to the growers of other surplus crops.

This has been the effect in every country that has tried it. The whole domestic price level of the commodity immediately raises the amount of the debenture.

As an independent proposition no one would advocate it. But as a part of a system no one can deny its logic and justice. It is merely restoring to the surplus farmer what is now taken away from him by force of law in the form of increased prices on tariff-laden articles.

Since the farmer, because of the tariff, must pay an increased price for the articles he buys, is it unfair to furnish him a correspondingly increased price tied on to the same system for the commodities he has for sale?

THE PRICE OF SUPPLIES

Let any farmer compare the prices he now pays for his farm wagon, his tools, his clothing, his furniture, and his supplies generally with the prices he paid for the same commodities in 1914. A large portion of this increase of the price of the supplies which he must use is due to the tariff system. The purpose of the debenture plan is to turn the tariff half way round and give the farmer a similar increase in the price of his products; in other words, to make the farmer a part of the tariff system. This has been the slogan of the whole farm movement for years.

RAILWAY RATE REDUCTIONS

The railway rate on steel from Chicago to San Francisco when intended for export is 40 cents per hundred. When intended for domestic use the rate is $1 per hundred. This difference is a direct export bounty on steel for the purpose of stimulating world trade. Just why is an export premium on steel sound and an export premium on wheat and cotton unsound? Just why is one a subsidy and the other good business? Is it any more unholy to have an export premium to stimulate world trade in cotton and wheat than on steel? What peculiar charm is there about steel? Is it somebody's pet? Understand, I do not say that an export premium on steel in the form of reduced rates as a stimulus to trade is unwise. The rate structure of this country is a tremendously intricate one. But, if it is justified on steel, why is it not justified on cotton and other surplus crops?

THE NATION'S PROBLEM

The farm problem is the Nation's problem. For years we have, through chambers of commerce, through trade journals, through booster talks, encouraged the building of cities. But, important as this is, we mdy become overindustrialized. We can not crowd all our population into the smoke-laden cities. Our great surplus crops constitute our raw material supply and margin of safety. Without them our smokestacks would rust in idleness. The one can not permanently prosper without the other.

Every objection which has been made against the debenture plan applies with equal force to the tariff system. So long as the protective tariff remains the policy of the country the debenture plan, or some similar one, must also apply in order that there may be governmental justice and democracy of opportunity.

WHEAT

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. TILSON. May I ask the gentleman what he is going to talk about?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. About the failure of the Congress to enact legislation on the question of the price of wheat.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes allotted to me I desire to talk about wheat and the price of wheat. If I may, Mr. Speaker, I desire to preface my remarks by reading an Associated Press Dispatch, a brief one, from Chicago:

CHICAGO, May 31.

The grain markets went careening down again to-day with new momentum.

Holders of wheat, corn, oats, and rye scrambled to unload their cargo, and the lowest wheat prices in 14 years failed to elicit a show of interest from apathetic buyers. Wheat was 2⅝ to 2¾ cents lower at the finish, contracts for May delivery sagging as low as 93¼ cents a bushel but closing at 94⅝, while July contracts went at 97½ to 97⅝ cents.

Mr. SIMMONS. On what date?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. May 31, 1929.

Mr. SIMMONS. What is the price to-day?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I do not know what the price to-day is, but I hope it is higher and I think it is somewhat higher.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. I think the gentleman will find that immediately after the telegram was sent which the gentleman has read the price of wheat rose 9½ cents.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I am very glad if it has risen, but if it has risen at all it has not risen because of any action on the part of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Does not the gentleman disregard the fact that the farm relief bill and the assurance of its passage was the thing that caused the rise in the price of wheat?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I would like to yield, but I have only a few minutes. If the gentleman will join with me in defeating this proposed recess, we will have all summer to discuss this question.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is pending in the Agricultural Committee Senate bill 101, relating to the establishment of stations for the purpose of ascertaining the protein quality of wheat. Bill 101 passed the Senate on the 18th of May, but that bill is nicely packed away in ice in the Agricultural Committee. If provision were made to ascertain the protein quality of wheat, it would raise the price of wheat to thousands of people in Montana, the Dakotas, Kansas, and Nebraska from 6 to 35 cents, and yet wheat to-day is something like $1—probably 80 cents—in my country, and we sit here and twiddle our thumbs and say we are going to take a recess.

Many of you may not understand what this protein proposition is. This bill provides that the Government shall establish agencies to chemically test the quality of wheat. I read briefly from a statement by Congressman BURTNESS, a very well-posted Member of this House from North Dakota. He knows all about wheat, and here is what he says on the question:

For wheat that had a protein content of 11½ per cent, December 20, 1927, the price over the regular December price was from 6 to 10 cents.

For wheat that had 12 per cent protein, the average in price beyond the prevailing wheat not so analyzed was 12 to 17 cents.

For wheat that had 12½ per cent protein there was an increase in price of 18 to 23 cents.

Thirteen per cent protein wheat enjoyed 25 to 31 cents profit; 13½ per cent protein wheat had an average of 30 to 37 cents, and 14 per cent wheat had an average of 36 to 43 cents.

In other words, if people could ascertain the quality of the wheat that might raise the price of wheat to the farmers of this country, particularly in all the arid sections of the country, anywhere from 6 to 35 cents. It appears to me it is absolutely inexcusable that the Congress sits idly here and does nothing. The Agricultural Committee, to which I have appealed personally to take up this matter and pass this bill or pass some bill, or at least investigate the matter, says, "No; we are going to take a recess."

This session was called primarily for one purpose, and that was to render some assistance to the farming people of the country.

This morning I received a telegram reading as follows:

HELENA, MONT., June 7, 1929.

Hon. JOHN M. EVANS,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Montana laws provide no funds for protein-testing laboratories. All grain marketing in State is on protein basis. Testing facilities are inadequate for testing farmers' wheat; can any relief be expected through Federal aid in financing the establishment of protein laboratories in this State?

GEORGE H. MORAN,
Chief Grain Inspector for Montana.

Under Senate bill No. 101, to which I have referred and which has twice passed the Senate, it is proposed to establish a group of protein-testing laboratories strategically located in each State where needed. These laboratories are to be operated by the United States Department of Agriculture in cooperation with the State agricultural colleges, or in lieu thereof with any other State agency with which cooperation is found practicable and desirable.

The purpose of these laboratories will be twofold: First, to make tests in connection with general surveys of the protein content of the crop prior to harvesting or during the early movement of the crop so that the basic information will be available upon which protein premiums may be established and stabilized; and, second, to provide the facilities by which farmers and others may conveniently have their wheat tested at the time of marketing.

In order that these laboratories may have the widest possible usefulness, educational and extension work will be carried on to inform farmers and elevator managers of the purpose and possibilities of these laboratories. For this reason the bill provides for cooperation with State agencies in an educational program.

Existing laboratories at terminal markets are performing a service for those who trade in grain, but the facilities necessary to insure that protein premiums are paid to the man who produces the grain are, in many instances, not accessible to producers. This bill provides for facilities, research, and education to insure the man who produces high-protein wheat will be paid according to the quality of his product.

This bill has the indorsement of the Department of Agriculture, and when it passed the Senate in February it had the indorsement of former Secretary W. M. Jardine. It has the indorsement of the Budget Bureau. It has the indorsement of Chester H. Gray, representative of the American Farm Bureau, and the leading farm organizations of the country as evidenced by the following correspondence:

MINNESOTA FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
St. Paul, Minn., April 23, 1928.

CHESTER H. GRAY,

Washington Representative American Farm Bureau Federation, Munsey Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. GRAY: I have your letter of the 19th instant, saying that Senator WALSH of Montana is asking our support to his bill (S. 3367) which provides that United States standards of grain shall be fixed and established for wheat to include a class or classes showing protein content.

I desire to say that we are very much in favor of this measure and, if enacted into law, will do away with all the controversy of wheat standards in the Northwest, so far as the farmer is concerned.

I sincerely hope that you can see your way clear to support this bill vigorously and trust we may enact it into law.

Respectfully,

J. F. REED, President.

From the Kansas State Farm Bureau of date April 23, 1928, I have this letter:

KANSAS STATE FARM BUREAU,
Manhattan, Kans., April 23, 1928.

CHESTER H. GRAY,

Munsey Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. GRAY: Referring to your letter relative to Senator WALSH'S bill providing that the United States grain standards shall include a class or classes showing percentage of protein. It seems to me this would be very desirable if it can be practically carried out.

One of the strong points made for the Kansas wheat pool is that it has established a practice in Kansas of marketing wheat on a protein basis. I think this is one of its greatest accomplishments. The fact that through that organization Kansas farmers can get a price for their wheat based on quality has been to my mind their greatest accomplishment up to date.

However, comparatively little wheat is sold on that basis at the present time in the State of Kansas. It means a great deal to the section of Kansas that grows good wheat. As marketing practices exist at the present time, either the elevator or the mill get the advantage of the high-standard wheat.

Sincerely yours,

RALPH SNYDER, President.

The Senate Committee on Agriculture held extensive hearings on this bill. They are available to anyone interested in the subject. With the information before this House and the pressing need for relief for the wheat growers of this country, I protest against any recess of this Congress until this matter has had the consideration to which it is entitled.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Montana has expired.

Mr. ADKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to be heard for five minutes on the same proposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADKINS. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, I was somewhat interested in the gentleman's statement that if the Agricultural Committee would take the protein bill off of ice and bring it before the House and pass it, it would have a good effect on the price of wheat.

Now, as a matter of fact, we sat and listened to the hearings before our committee on the so-called protein bill. There is no contention made even by its proponents that the farmers are not getting paid for the protein content of their wheat, because they are. There is a contention as to who is right in ascertaining the amount of protein in a shipment of wheat and this is a very complicated question.

As a matter of fact, the protein content of wheat is not taken into consideration in the price quotations received by the grain men all over the country on which they buy wheat. Some seasons, when there is a large amount of protein in all the wheat—in other words, when we have a large amount of dry weather—there is, of course, a large amount of protein and the premium paid for protein wheat is very infinitesimal. In other years when the protein content of wheat is small, and there is a small amount of it in the country, a very nice premium is paid. It sometimes runs up as high as 50 cents a bushel for a limited amount of high protein wheat to mix with the other wheat that is milled in order to have a proper balance of protein in the flour. Sometimes we have to import some of this high protein wheat from Canada to meet this demand.

So far as the gentleman's contention is concerned, that if this bill were to pass it would raise the price of wheat, the passage of that bill would not raise the price a dime. We do not produce any high protein wheat in the Middle West anyhow. Such wheat is produced in Oklahoma, Kansas, and the Northwest. All the Canadian wheat is high in protein content.

With respect to passing a bill to establish the exact amount of protein in wheat arriving at the market, that is a controversial question and involves the question of who is right in determining the protein content of wheat. Nobody has determined that yet even from the same batch of wheat or the same car of wheat, and it was disclosed in our hearings that the same chemist would find on two analyses two different results from testing the protein from samples taken from the same car or in some instances from two samples taken from the same field.

There is no disposition on the part of the Committee on Agriculture to put this matter or any other proposition on ice if it is a matter that will be of benefit to the American farmer; and there is no man here who can say that the passage of this bill will raise the price of wheat in Illinois or in any other Central State a dime. It is just a question of ascertaining who is the proper authority to get the exact protein content of the wheat that is analyzed.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADKINS. I yield.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Does the gentleman believe that because it will not raise the price of wheat in Illinois that the bill should not be passed to raise the price of wheat in other States?

Mr. ADKINS. It will not raise the price of wheat in any place. It is admitted on all sides——

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I do not admit it.

Mr. ADKINS. The hearings are all available to the gentleman, and if he will read the hearings——

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I have read them. The trouble is the members of the Committee on Agriculture have not read them.

Mr. ADKINS. The committee heard all this from witnesses before it went into the record. The premium paid for protein depends on the scarcity of protein in the crop growing that year. If the crop generally throughout the country has a large protein content, there is very little premium paid on protein. If the protein is short, they will bid up the price for a limited amount.

The only controversy that comes about is when a dispute arises between buyer and seller as to the protein content of a shipment the question is with regard to the advisability of creating a Federal laboratory as a sort of supreme court, the same as we have now with respect to controversies over grades, so that when there comes a difference between the buyer and the seller as to the protein content, one chemist saying one analysis is right and the other saying another is right, we would have a Government laboratory to settle such differences.

It does not affect the price of wheat one penny, and it is a very much controverted question as to whether it would do any good anyhow or not if such laboratories were provided for.

We will probably pass a bill of this kind if the facts show it will help, but so far as advocating it as a farm relief measure is concerned, nobody who knows anything about grain marketing in this country would make that contention at all. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

IMPEACHMENT PROCEDURE

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I want to direct the attention of the House to a concurrent resolution which I introduced some time ago, asking for the appointment of a committee of three Members of the House and three Members of the Senate to investigate, determine, and report back as to whether or not there may be effected improvements in the procedure with regard to impeachment.

That ought to be done now, for the reason that it is within the personal knowledge of a large number of those who constitute the present House and the present Senate the experience had in the English impeachment case and the procedure had and that contemplated in that case. It is sufficient to say in these five minutes that the procedure which now obtains in the American practice is not materially different from the procedure as it had developed in the fifteenth century, at a time when the judgment of the House of Lords could result in the confiscation of property and in the death of the person convicted.

Under the American procedure, and under the American Constitution, impeachment as a matter of fact is an ouster suit, and the judgment can extend no further than ouster, and a possible bar from holding office in the future. It is such an action with such a limitation upon the scope and the possibilities of judgment that ordinarily, under our system, gives responsibility of trial and judgment to the civil courts. In the language of the common understanding it is a civil action conducted under the rules of criminal procedure.

I do not want, in these five minutes, to indicate what improvement, in my judgment, could be effected, further than to say that I see nothing in the judgment to be arrived at, the end to be sought, or the rights and interest involved which would prevent the possibility at least of taking a considerable part of the testimony by deposition.

In the Judge English impeachment case—I see my colleague the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] on the floor, and other Members who were connected with that proceeding—we confronted this probability: If that case had gone to trial in the Senate, it would have been necessary to have brought from St. Louis probably 100 witnesses, to the great inconvenience of the citizens of that country, enormous expense upon the Federal Government, and kept those witnesses in Washington while every detail of the case, of the prosecution and the defense, was developed under the strict rules of criminal procedure. Certainly no injustice could have been done in that case if a considerable part of the record, a considerable part of the case presented to the Senate, could have been presented by deposition.

With the enormous increase in the number of Federal judges and the increasing demand upon the time of the Senate incident to the development of the country and the shift of governmental responsibility to the Federal Government, the suspension of the entire operations of the Senate while the entire body sits as a trier of impeachment charged under a procedure developed centuries ago, when the issues of life and death were involved, becomes more and more important, and comes more and more under the questioning of common sense.

I do not want to go any further; I do not want to indicate what in my judgment could be the improvement effected. Certainly no harm could be done by appointing a committee of three by the Speaker and three by the proper officer of the Senate to study this question. It ought to be done now when this information gotten in the recent case and the experience in that case is fresh in the mind of the present membership of Congress. It ought to be done now when we can be deliberate, and when power and policy can be determined upon the principles of law and of justice, with no possibility that the exigencies of a given situation may unconsciously—I know it would not consciously—influence in any degree the conclusion arrived at, instead of having to consider procedure when we are going into trial of an impeachment case. I hope that the gentleman of the Rules Committee——

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. DENISON. Is an impeachment trial a criminal or a civil proceeding?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. It is regarded as a criminal proceeding.

Mr. DENISON. Then how are you going to get around the provision of the Constitution that a person charged with crime shall be confronted by the witnesses?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. It is my judgment that the Senate is the judge of the method of procedure within reasonable limits. After all, the question is, Is an impeachment under our Constitution a criminal proceeding? Is its object the discovery and punishment of crime? Our Constitution prevents the Senate upon conviction rendering the character of judgment which under our procedure, and under procedure generally, courts with jurisdiction in criminal cases only may render. Crimes which the person impeached may have committed are preceded with reference to in the usual way notwithstanding the impeachment proceeding. By the express language of the Constitution it is provided:

> Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law.

In five minutes, of course, I can not possibly discuss that matter further, but no harm can be done by appointing a committee to study the question and report back. There would be no expense. It seems to me there is a possibility of improvement in procedure, which would shorten and cheapen the procedure, lessen the burden upon the Senate, and fully protect every right and interest of the accused and of the Government. In any event let us examine the question and see whether or not this can be done.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

FARM RELIEF

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. TILSON. Reserving the right to object, on what subject?

Mr. CANNON. On a magazine article by my colleague the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

Mr. TILSON. On the general farm subject?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, while the farm bill was under consideration in the House I asked the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] to explain to us in what way it would be possible under the pending bill to make the tariff effective on surplus farm products. There came to my desk this morning a magazine article written by the gentleman from Iowa in which he elaborates upon the reply which he made on that occasion.

This article is the Madison paper of the farm bill. It is the interpretation placed upon that legislation by the chairman of the committee which reported the bill and by the veteran Member of the House who was in charge of it during its consideration. Officially, he is the last authority on agricultural legislation, and on this bill in particular. The bill bears his name and we are to understand that he supervised its formulation and its enactment.

His opinion, therefore, as to its mechanism and its functions, the powers and authority of the board which it creates, and the general purposes and objectives of the bill as a whole, are of the first importance. I quote that portion of the article in which he replies to my inquiry:

> When I was explaining the bill on the floor of the House previous to its passage I was asked whether the plan would make the tariff effective so as to benefit the farmer.
> My reply was: "We are not setting up here any definite plan. We leave that to the board to determine. We must have confidence in the board. We have confidence in the administration; and unless we have I take it that this bill, as is the case with other bills, may not be worth the paper it is written on. Legislation is one thing and the enforcement of it is a different thing. We have many laws which are not carried out, but we must depend upon the executive branch of this Government to carry out the declaration of Congress."
> MANY PLANS HAVE BEEN ADVOCATED
> A little later I said: "So far as is known, there are only two methods by which to prevent the exportable surplus from unduly depressing the prices of the commodity.
> "One, as made effective to organized industry, the equalization plan; to give the producers the full control over the marketing of the whole production, to sell for domestic consumption, at the American price level—the world price plus the tariff—and each producer contributing his ratable share of the cost of equalizing the price and to receive his proportionate share of the profits therefrom. In other words, to make the protective laws effective, as, for instance, the Adamson Act and our immigration laws are made effective through labor organizations to influence the wage scale, and as the Federal reserve act is made effective through the Federal Reserve Board exercising its power in controlling the volume and flow of currency, thus influencing the rate of interest.
> "Or a subsidy plan, such as the debenture plan, the allotment plan, the licensing plan, and the withdrawal plan.
> "Under the first, the equalization plan, the producer pays the cost of equalizing the price, and under the subsidy plan Uncle Sam pays the cost.
> "It will be for the board to determine which plan shall be employed in maintaining advantageously domestic markets, so that the surplus shall not unduly depress the price of the commodity.
> "MAKING THE TARIFF EFFECTIVE
> "Personally I believe, as I always have, in not only a protective tariff, but also to make it effective all along the line. A tariff to protect American labor and American industry and every worthy and legitimate enterprise, one to maintain the American high standard of living, one that will result in the common good of all the people.
> "Undoubtedly, the American producers are entitled not only to an adequate tariff but also that it be made effective; that is, as stated in the declaration of policy, to maintain advantageous domestic markets and to prevent such surpluses from unduly depressing the price for the commodity. In other words, that they be insured the American price level—the world price plus the tariff. * * *
> "I believe it is fair to assume that any law operating in the interest of one and against another, as in the case of our tariff laws, should be made effective all along the line. I believe that the farmers are entitled to and in need of farm-relief legislation. As to that, there seems to be little difference of opinion. There are, however, differences of opinion as to by what method it may be made effective. It will be for the board to determine by what method it shall be accomplished."

The statement of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture is both frank and definite. He construes the new law as directing the farm board to so control the exportable surplus as to maintain the American price level—the world price plus the tariff—and leaves to the board merely the option of determining by what method that result shall be accomplished.

This, then, is the task awaiting the farm board—the effectuation of farm tariffs, insuring American farmers a world price plus the tariff for their products. And certainly its appointment could not come at a more opportune time. Wheat, for example, is to-day at the lowest comparative price in the history of the United States. And it is pertinent to note in passing that this collapse in prices comes in the few weeks that have elapsed since Mr. Hoover sent his bill to Congress and its provisions and the certainty of its passage were assured.

What is the cause of this unprecedented break in the price of wheat? The question may be answered on the highest authority, the Department of Agriculture, which has for the last six years opposed every plan for farm relief supported by the agricultural organizations. This morning's mail brought to every Member of Congress the monthly report of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics. On pages 1 and 2 appears the following:

> Two factors are spreading like a wave of pessimism over a large section of the country. One is the backward rainy weather which has persisted for two months. The other is the low price of wheat. * * * The decline in wheat prices has been described as one of the most serious in recent years. It certainly has been a cause of discouragement to those farmers who held their wheat until late spring. * * * The level of wheat prices during the coming season will depend largely on how the world wheat yields turn out.

There is the explanation. Farm prices have dropped because the tariff is not effective. The American price is governed by the world price. It is an ideal situation to test the efficacy of the law. All that is needed is for the new board to step in with the power which Chairman HAUGEN says is conferred by the new law and decide which method they will employ to take the surplus off the market, and immediately the tariff will become effective and the American farmer will receive an American price for his wheat.

Nothing less will fulfill the pledges made to the farmer by both parties in the last campaign. And nothing less will comport with the construction placed by Chairman HAUGEN on the provisions of the bill just passed. Of course, there will be some slight rise in the price of wheat. There is always a reaction to a great break in the market. The price of wheat ordinarily swings like a pendulum. Having gone too far down, inevitably it comes back up on the rebound. And partisans will be quick to attribute the natural reaction to the legislation just enacted.

But we have Mr. HAUGEN's statement here to show that a mere rise in the price of wheat is no indication of the effect of the bill or the work of the board. Under the criterion set by Mr. HAUGEN, the law and the bill, in order to attain the objective which he has set, must give the farmer 42 cents per bushel—the amount of the tariff—above the world market.

When the domestic price of wheat at Minneapolis reaches a quotation of 42 cents a bushel above the price at Winnipeg, then the purpose of the bill, as expressed by Mr. HAUGEN, will have been realized. And until the American farmer is given this price for his wheat the law is a failure and a betrayal of the pledges made to the American farmer in the last campaign.

If the gentleman from Iowa desires to make any revision of his statement as published, or to take issue on the conclusions thus reached, I shall be glad to have him ask time for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

WHEAT

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes upon the subject discussed by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. EVANS] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADKINS] and refer to the protein and gluten content of wheat.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, I was much interested in the colloquy between the gentleman from Montana [Mr. EVANS] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADKINS] in reference to the protein content of wheat, which is too frequently overlooked in marketing wheat and in comparing prices of wheat in domestic and foreign markets.

No grain is more important to mankind than wheat. Its history reads like a romance.

The origin of wheat is lost in the mists of antiquity. Of ancient origin, it was cultivated by prehistoric races, as, for instance, the Swiss lake dwellers. Samples practically the same as the modern grain have been found in the tombs of Egypt and other ancient empires. Efforts to germinate grains of wheat found in the wrappings of Egyptian mummies have failed.

In ruins of prehistoric times grains of wheat and barley have been found with the wooden plowshare and the stone hand mill, the latter consisting of a hollowed stone and a circular stone ball. Some of these rude utensils, relics of the Stone Age, have been found in burial places or embedded in the earth near or under which man had his habitation in the morning twilight of the world.

Wheat and barley are the oldest cereals known to have been cultivated by man.

The Chinese claim that wheat was known to and used by them as early as 2700 B. C., while its use in Egypt antedated that period.

Strange as it may appear, we have no record of wheat growing wild or reseeding itself without the help of man. In early ages wheat plowing was done with a bent stick or a wooden plow.

Humboldt says that wheat was accidentally introduced into Mexico with rice brought from Spain by negro slaves belonging to Cortez; and the same writer says he saw at Quito the earthen vase in which a Flemish monk had introduced from Ghent the first wheat grown in South America.

All grains contain nutritious substances of a similar character, although they vary both in quantity and proportion in different grains, namely:

First. Gluten, which affords the tissue-building nourishment for the animal body.

Second. Fecula, or starch, which provides the body heat and energy.

Third. A sweet mucilage, called dextrin, which is more nutritious than starch, but is small in quantity and renders the grain liable to vinous acetous fermentation.

Fourth. A small proportion of fat, ranging from 1 per cent in barley to 6 per cent in oats.

Fifth. A digestible aromatic substance contained in the hulls, which consists of fibrous matter.

Sixth. Moisture, which is prevalent even in dry grains, and increases the weight of the mass, although it lessens the specific gravity. It affords no nourishment and hastens the decomposition of all kinds of grains if they are not kept very dry. This nourishment also influences germination.

Baking is probably the very oldest industry in which man has ever engaged. Bread baking has reached its present high state of perfection through a long process of evolution. First there was the hot stone, then the flat sheet of iron, then the sheet of iron with the edges turned up, and finally the modern baking equipment.

The merit of flour is in the elasticity of the dough it makes. The more elastic the dough, the better it retains the gas generated by fermentation, and the more uniformly distributed is the gas through the loaf. This is due to the protein. The gliadin and glutenin are gradually broken down through the process accompanying yeast fermentation, resulting gradually in the proper ripening of dough in five or six hours, without which the finished product would be tough and rubberlike.

We understand that protein is a generic term and that gluten is a nitrogenous substance, and one of the component elements of protein. We frequently hear reference made to the gluten content of wheat, and it should also be treated as a generic term.

Gluten is that part of the protein content of wheat which is insoluble in water. It is a combination of two proteid substances, gliadin and glutenin. The first contains 17.66 per cent nitrogen and the second 17.49 per cent. These two elements are not chemically combined in the wheat kernel, but the union or combination is initiated by the presence of water.

As found in wheat-flour dough, gluten consists of about two-thirds gliadin and one-third glutenin. This makes the dough "sticky" in trapping the bubbles of gas from the fermentative action of the yeast or the chemical action of the baking powder which results in a lightening of the dough and its conversion into a "sponge."

Some glutens are tough and elastic, while others are soft and "rotten," the latter lack the quality of absorbing water and do not hold the "sponge" made by the yeast, thus making a poorer bread and fewer loaves to the barrel. The strength of the gluten depends on the proportion of gliadin to the glutenin and also to the presence or absence of certain mineral salts. Of two samples of flour containing equal parts of gluten, one may be worth in bread making more than twice the value of the other, because in the first there is a larger proportion of gliadin than in the second.

The great flour milling concerns maintain a staff of experts to analyze wheats and ascertain the proportion of gluten and also to determine what proportion of that gluten is gliadin and what part glutenin; and the value of the wheat for flour-making purposes depends upon the result of these examinations, and this explains why the American millers will pay a premium on Canadian wheat, because it contains a greater proportion of gluten and a larger amount of gliadin content than the American wheats.

About 16 pounds of gluten is obtained from 200 pounds of wheat flour.

The character of wheat as "starchy" or glutinous is determined largely by the soil and climate. A short, forcing growing season and a fertile soil have a tendency to produce glutinous wheat, while the opposite conditions produce "starchy" wheat. When hard glutinous seed wheat is sown in regions which produce "starchy" wheats, the hard wheat gradually changes its character and in about two years becomes "starchy." Whether wheat is hard or soft depends on the amount and character of its gluten. Hard wheat usually contains over 12 per cent of gluten, of which 45 to 60 per cent is in the form of gliadin, which, as I have stated, is an alcohol-soluble protein, while soft wheat contains less gluten, but gluten of a higher gliadin content.

Extensive experiments have been conducted by Lawes and Gilbert, of Rothamsted, England, on the influence of fertilizer on gluten and starch content of wheat, and it has been found that while fertilizers increase the yield, they do not materially, if at all, increase the amount or proportion of starch and gluten. But climatic conditions do affect the composition. Moreover, wheat grown on the same soil in different years show greater variations in composition than wheats grown the same year, but differently fertilized.

In protein content, wheats range from 7 to 18 per cent. The most nitrogenous wheats do not necessarily make the most glutinous flour, as frequently a large portion of the nitrogen is in the germ or offals. It is not possible to make accurate comparisons as to the composition of wheats grown in different countries. It has been frequently found that wheats grown in different localities in the same country vary as much in composition as do wheats grown in different countries. One of the peculiarities of the wheat plant is that it assimilates its nitrogen and mineral food from the soil at a more rapid rate than the ordinary grain plant. This is especially true in reference to spring wheat. By the time the spring wheat crop is half grown, over three-fourths of the mineral food and nitrogen needed for construction purposes and for the development and maturity of the grain have been taken from the soil. This ought to emphasize the necessity of not allowing the soil on which wheat is grown to become impoverished.

The productivity of the wheat lands in the northwestern area of the United States has been materially reduced by constant cropping and by a withdrawal from our soils of those chemical properties so essential for the production of wheat with a large glutinous-gliadin content. The new lands of the Canadian Northwest and the short forced growing season give to the Canadian wheats a glutinous-gliadin content, largely in excess of the glutenin-gliadin content of our American wheats grown on lands that are being rapidly impoverished by constant cropping and without diversification of crops. The American millers know why they want the Canadian wheats to mix with the American wheat, the combination making a grade of flour which it is impossible to produce from American wheats alone grown in some seasons, for the reason that while we produce some wheat in the United States with as large a glutinous-gliadin content as the Canadian wheat, still we produce that grade of wheat in such limited quantities that some years the supply is wholly inadequate to meet the demand of the American millers.

The great wheat fields in the United States are each year producing wheat of a lower gluten content than in previous years. As I have said, two things are necessary to produce wheat with a higher glutenin-gliadin content: First, the soil must be comparatively new, and there must be a comparatively short growing season. The great bulk of Canadian wheat has a higher gluten and gliadin content than the wheat produced in the United States for the reason that the Canadian soils are comparatively new and the growing season in Canada is much shorter than in the United States. In the great Wheat Belt of the Northwest, when the lands were first cultivated, the wheat grown had a much larger gluten content than now.

I am making these observations to call attention to the indisputable fact that, as the years go on, the wheat produced in the United States will each year contain a smaller gluten content than the year before, although in some years the seasonal conditions may be such as to give the American wheat a higher gluten content than in former years; but as to the gluten content of American wheat the tendency will be downward as the years come and go. Of course, when the Canadian wheat fields have lost their virginity and been cultivated for years the wheat grown thereon will contain a smaller glutenin-gliadin content than that produced at the present time.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADKINS] seems to think that testing the wheat to ascertain the gluten content will not influence the market price. I am not prepared to say just what the effect will be, but I am of the opinion that if the test is honestly and accurately made it will be beneficial to the wheat growers of the Nation.

It is a well-known fact that sometimes in the great Wheat Belt, especially in the semiarid regions, as the result of drouth or other seasonal conditions the yield and quality of wheat is very unsatisfactory. Frequently the grains are small and shriveled and the wheat does not present a very attractive appearance. The millers have been buying this kind of wheat, sometimes paying only 40 or 50 cents a bushel on the theory that it was inferior wheat. Of course, it is in a sense inferior wheat; but it has a very high gluten content, frequently a much higher gluten content than well-developed wheat. That is to say, the gluten content of this damaged and seemingly worthless wheat is frequently very high, and the farmers have been selling it on the theory that it was not worth much; when in truth and fact it furnished the millers a supply of wheat with a relatively large gluten content, and frequently the farmers receive much less than the real value for this grade of wheat. [Applause.]

CONFERENCE REPORT ON CENSUS AND APPORTIONMENT BILL

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, there is a possibility that the conferees on the apportionment bill may reach a conclusion and have their report ready to file before midnight to-night. In view of that fact I ask unanimous consent that they be permitted up until midnight to-night to file a conference report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FREIGHT RATES ON WHEAT AND STEEL FOR EXPORT

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, may I speak on the subject of wheat for a while?

The SPEAKER. The Chair could not use his discretion in respect to that.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the Chair be kind enough to ask the House if I may do so?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, in the two minutes allotted to me I am going to ask a grave question, one which every one of you must answer, and that question is, If it be right for the Interstate Commerce Commission to grant a low export railroad freight rate on the products of the Steel Trust, why would it not also be right for the commission to grant an identical low export rate on the products of the American farm? [Applause.]

Now, gentlemen, I have introduced House Joint Resolution 95, directing the Interstate Commerce Commission to do for the products of the farm what it has voluntarily done for the products of the Steel Trust. When the Interstate Commerce Commission issued an order giving steel products a low freight rate to the sea Congress had not acted; Congress did not direct that body to enter that rate. The Interstate Commerce Commission acted voluntarily. Why should it not act voluntarily now?

Of course, it would be better to get my resolution before the House, and if we could I think it would pass in about two minutes. But under the peculiar conditions that exist our committees are not functioning. Yesterday morning I asked our Speaker if it would be in order to refer my resolution to some committee which is functioning, probably the Committee on Agriculture, and he told me, quite properly perhaps, that my question was not a proper parliamentary inquiry. [Applause.]

Once again I ask that grave question, a question which demands instant answer, If it be right to grant a low export rail rate on products of the Steel Trust, why not exactly the same low export rail rate on products of the American farm?

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, on yesterday the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] discussed this subject of reduced freight rates for farm products intended for export. Both he and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HOWARD], who has just spoken, left the impression, it seemed to me, that these reduced rates on export products are ordered to be put in by the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is not the fact.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. DENISON. I do not mean to say that the gentleman has misrepresented the facts.

Mr. HOWARD. The gentleman has stated that it is not a fact—what I said. What does the gentleman mean by that expression?

Mr. DENISON. I mean simply that the gentleman from Nebraska is mistaken in the inference that he draws from facts which I think are incorrectly stated. I do not want the gentleman from Nebraska to understand that I am reflecting on him at all, because I think too much of him for that. When reduced freight rates are put into effect on products intended for export, it is done on the initiative of the railroads themselves. When the railroads apply for permission to put into effect a reduced rate the commission simply permits it to be done. They do not order it to be done. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] discussed this subject yesterday as though reduced rates on export products was a bounty given to the manufacturers of steel; or as though it was a Government subsidy.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. DENISON. In a moment.

These reduced rates are given by the railroads in the belief that by so doing they would enable the products to move, whereas if they did not do so, the products would not move at all. It is not a subsidy.

In Germany, for instance, where the railroads belong to the Government and the Government wants to encourage or help the manufacturers by that sort of a plan, instead of by a protective tariff, the Government does often authorize railroad rates for export products that are down even below the actual cost of transportation. That is never done in this country. The railroads sometimes grant reduced rates in order to encourage the export business, but the Interstate Commerce Commission does not allow this unless the railroads get at least some profit from the business.

So it is not in any sense a subsidy in this country, where the railroads are privately owned. It is the carrier and not the Government that grants whatever benefits are granted by reduced rates on export products. The railroads have recently, at the suggestion of the President, it is said, granted rather low export rates on wheat which is now stored in the elevators of the country. It was thought that this would enable the surplus of old wheat to move to the foreign markets before the new wheat crop came onto the market.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. What percentage of reduction has been granted to steel products, and what percentage of reduction has been granted to wheat?

Mr. DENISON. I am not familiar with those percentages.

Mr. HOWARD. For the information of the gentleman I give him the testimony of one of our colleagues, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. GARBER], who tells me that he has investigated the subject and has ascertained that the reductions on steel products are from 45 to 60 per cent. Now, if the gentleman knows what the reduction granted on wheat is, he knows more than I do, but I am informed that it is not in excess of 10 per cent.

Mr. DENISON. I am not able to give that information to the gentleman from Nebraska, although I understood from the newspapers that it is a very substantial reduction. However, in the case of wheat it will not amount to any substantial advantage, because just as soon as it was announced, reduced rates, I am told, were put in from Argentina to Liverpool; so as long as we try to get a market for export American wheat in that way, other countries will resort to the same practice, and it does not do us any particular good in the long run. What the rate on export wheat was I do not know, but I understand it was a very substantial reduction from the regular rates.

But the point I wish to make in reply to both the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HOWARD] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] is that reduced freight rates on manufactured or agricultural products intended for export are not ordered put into effect by the Government or the commission. They are put into effect by the railroads, with the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, in order to get business which otherwise would not exist, to get freight which otherwise would not move; such reductions in export freight rates do not amount to a Government subsidy in any sense of the word.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I am surprised at the statement of the gentleman from Illinois. While it is true that the Interstate Commerce Commission as a rule does not initiate rates and rate reductions and rate schedules, it may do so if it chooses to do so.

Of course, as a usual thing, when a railway company applies for a reduction that reduction may be allowed without a hearing, but the Interstate Commerce Commission, according to the law, has the right to reduce any rate in the rate schedules and has the right to do it on its own motion. It has plenary power. Of course, it must allow a hearing; but, at the same time, it has that power and has that authority.

In my speech on yesterday I quoted figures showing that steel has been given from 35 per cent to 60 per cent reductions when the same is destined for shipment abroad. That has been the condition for the last 30 years. Cotton is the greatest export commodity in America, but at no time during that 30 years has there been a less rate on cotton when it went into exportation than there has been when it has been used for domestic purposes. True, a small temporary reduction was made on wheat intended for export. But the much larger reductions on automobiles, on farm implements, and on steel have been in the permanent rate structure of the country for many years.

The gentleman says that is not an export premium, but let me tell you that the law of this country and the Constitution of our land forbids our making a general rate structure that will be confiscatory, and whenever you grant one-half rates on the exportation of steel, on the exportation of automobiles, and on the exportation of farm implements to foreign countries you must make that up in the general rate structure of the country. If the Interstate Commerce Commission is going to allow one-half rates when steel goes to a foreign country, it ought also to allow those one-half rates on cotton, on wheat, and on the other farm commodities. If it is not going to do so, it should do away with these preferential rates and thus bring down the whole rate structure of the country.

Of course, if all of these cases—and there are a great many of them I find on investigation—in which this advantage is given were done away with the whole rate structure could be brought down.

Why is it that the American farmer should pay twice as much freight when he buys a cultivator as a foreigner must pay? Why should the southern or western farmer pay twice as much freight on the automobile he buys as the foreigner pays on that same automobile made in this country? Gentlemen, this is a democratic country—or, at least, it ought to be—and it is simply democratic equality that they all be placed on the same basis.

I have offered a similar resolution to the one offered by the gentleman from Nebraska, and there is not a man living who can gainsay the justice of putting these things on a basis of equality. That was the reason for my asking the same freight rates in favor of the men who are working in the far corners of this country trying to make a living as are granted to the concerns that have some of these preferential rates throughout the country. If any of you were not present to hear the disclosures I made yesterday I ask you to look at the RECORD of this morning and see the number of items on which these premiums are allowed. It all comes from the people of the country. I do not care what arguments may be made, it comes from all the people of the country and must be made up in increased rates. [Applause.]

I realize the great work the Interstate Commerce Commission is called upon to do. I know they have great difficulties in adjusting rates to suit the various needs of the country. But the same philosophy underlies the need to stimulate our foreign trade in the products of the farm and ranch as in industry.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—FARM RELIEF

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, the House has just approved the conference report on H. R. 1, a bill to establish a Federal farm board to promote the effective merchandising of agricultural commodities and to place agriculture on a basis of economic equality with other industries. The Senate, it is expected, will agree to the same conference report, and one of the most important laws ever enacted by any government on behalf of agriculture will be tried out under the wide powers granted by the act.

From the nature of things it is impossible for agriculture as a whole to centralize so as to function like ordinary private business is able to do. Whatever may be the claims offered by different industries in denial of trust agreements and price fixing, it is certain that never in all history have so many combinations occurred with various great business organizations, primarily for the purpose of producing and placing on the market products at the lowest possible cost and thus eventually controlling the price by destroying competition.

Competition has practically ceased in many lines of business and several corporations proudly publish their reports to-day showing a capitalization exceeding $1,000,000,000. With a rapid tendency evidenced since the war it is now likely that within a half century or less practically all separate kinds of business will be organized under one particular head, and combinations of different kinds of business like the average departmental store will be controlled under one manager. Through tariff laws we have placed embargoes on many of our products, thereby preventing competition from abroad. When this product and eventually all products are brought under one control to collect all the traffic will bear, it will bring about an economic change that may well call for study at this time.

Elimination of any real competition in business is a subject which students of economics now look upon with apprehension, if not with actual alarm. It is a new problem in our commercial life. Like that of railways and public utilities, which first engaged in wild exploitation and cut-throat competition until they were controlled by law, both as to profits and service, other lines of business may eventually require similar legislative control.

It is not a matter of theory but one of fact which confronts the business world. When necessity arises, the Constitution, laws, and courts will always provide a way. In the meantime we are drifting along without any well-defined policy of meeting the problem.

A situation diametrically opposite to close-corporation management arises when hundreds of thousands of individual agriculturists without any cohesive agency are placed at the mercy of the world at large by aggressive competition. Growers of wheat in Ukraine and Czechoslovakia now compete with the growers of grain in the United States, all seeking a common market for surplus goods in Liverpool. No protection can be given the American producer of this surplus by any tariff, however high.

NO TARIFF PROTECTS A GRAIN SURPLUS

A 42-cent duty on $1 wheat is a glaring example of tariff absurdity that does not and can not protect the American farmer. With Canadian rail rates below rates on this side of the border, with heavily increased taxes, labor and farm machinery, and living costs, due in part to conditions described, the American grain farmer has been thrust down far below a "basis of economic equality with other industries."

That situation is uncontrolled, so that some other remedy than a tariff must be provided if agriculture is to receive any real protection. It is attempted under House bill No. 1, which authorizes an appropriation of $500,000,000 to be handled by an administrative board that will seek to prevent any serious calamity to agriculture, and as announced in section 1 of the act—it is the announced policy of the United States in the pending farm bill—

To minimize such price fluctuations by controlling any seasonal or year's total surplus, produced in the United States and either local or national in extent, that is in excess of the requirements for the orderly marketing of any agricultural commodity or in excess of the domestic requirements for such commodity.

For this purpose a $500,000,000 revolving fund is to be made immediately available.

This is a large amount of money to be used, if necessary, for the protection of agriculture, but it should be remembered that agriculture was the backbone of our armies during the World War, and without that support we would have been helpless to finance or maintain our armies in Europe. In fact, but for our farmers and their efforts at that time to produce the war might have been lost, and, in addition, countless thousands of noncombatants, women, and children would have died of famine in the war-stricken countries.

One hundred million dollars a day and more was frequently expended by this Government to carry on the last war. Five hundred million dollars, the amount named in this agricultural bill, was frequently expended in a single week during 1918. Five hundred million dollars was expended for aircraft during the last war without producing a single fighting plane of American manufacture. To cite war losses would present waste that makes insignificant the amount carried in this bill.

Countless millions of expenditures by the Government, including a flood control law last session that will eventually cost the Government far more than the $500,000,000 named in H. R. 1, will be remembered, so we need not be apprehensive over this initial effort to support and protect agriculture in all its different activities.

If agriculture is prosperous, then the great army of American farm consumers, some 30,000,000 in number counting families, will help maintain prosperity for our great manufacturing industries. I believe it is more than a mere experiment. The fact that within 48 hours after it was certain the bill would become law wheat prices jumped approximately 12 cents per bushel on the market affords an argument in favor of the farm relief law's passage.

AN INDEFENSIBLE SUGAR TARIFF

A grotesque illustration of exploitation of the American farmer in the name of agriculture is afforded in the tariff bill recently passed by the House and now before the Senate. One schedule in that bill, the greatest necessity of life, has been increased 40 per cent to the farmer consumer under a plea of helping agriculture and sugar-beet growers.

A few weak domestic sugar manufacturers who can not successfully compete with cane growers have demanded and secured in the bill now before the Senate a boost in sugar prices that will affect every one of 30,000,000 agricultural sugar consumers. For every dollar paid these weak sugar mills the farming communities, based on a 100-pound average per capita consumption, will pay out $3 to $4, while the remaining 90,000,000 consumers will pay three times that amount to sugar mills, a great majority of which are prosperous.

Plainly stated, without successful contradiction, the sugar rate as passed by the House or a sliding sugar scale, now proposed by the Senate, is offered to aid needy sugar mills that produce only 8 per cent of all the sugar we consume, and we must pay this increased tariff in order to give slight help to these weak mills, together with increased profits to highly prosperous mills of the Great Western Co. that produce one-half of all our domestic beet sugar.

The Hawaiian, Porto Rico, and Philippines that produce 33 per cent of all sugar we consume and report large profits annually on sugar imported to us free of duty, will also reap additional profits on their present large earnings. Cuba, that furnishes 50 per cent of our sugar, will pay the increased tariff duty which will be reflected in an increased sugar cost charged American consumers.

When it is remembered that the bulk of labor in the American sugar-beet fields to be "protected" is child and woman labor of the cheapest kind, and it is now proposed to include convict labor in Michigan, according to statements of the Detroit press placed in the RECORD, the extravagance of claims to aid agriculture by this one sugar schedule is apparent. It places a heavy increased burden on every farmer's family in order to help, not one real farmer in a thousand, but a few weak mills that employ Mexican, child, and women cheap labor in the sugar-beet fields. That is the sugar schedule now asking for a 40 per cent increased rate in order to heavily mulct American consumers from $120,000,000 to $240,000,000 annually. Other similar illustrations of tariff protection that fails to protect are known to every farmer in the land.

The purpose of this farm relief bill is to give a moderate increase in value to needy agricultural producers.

The difference between one-dollar and two-dollar wheat was shown to be infinitesimal in any increased cost of a loaf of bread during the war. Labor, and not farm products, largely determines the increased price of such necessities.

In a modest way in past years I have sought to be of some service in supporting just tax laws and measures for the benefit of labor and agriculture that is helpless except where thoroughly organized. For the same reason I have now voted for H. R. No. 1, with a belief that although in some respects it is an experiment, I expect it will give vitality to farm cooperatives, and through education, advice, and financial support will enable agriculture to be placed, as proposed by the bill, "on a basis of economic equality with other industries."

EXTENSION OF FOOD AND DRUGS ACT TO TOBACCO AND TOBACCO PRODUCTS

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, 10 years ago, when in certain quarters of our metropolitan cities a saloon flourished on every corner, when red lights marked houses of infamy, when blazing electric signs reminded the passerby that it was time for another drink of whisky, no tobacco manufacturer, despite the vast license permitted, had the temerity to cry to our women, "Smoke cigarettes—they are good for you." When newspapers were filled with cure-all and patent-medicine advertisements, no manufacturer of a tobacco product dared to offer nicotine as a substitute for wholesome foods; no cigarette manufacturer was so bold as to fly in the face of established medical and health opinion by urging adolescent boys to smoke cigarettes, or young girls—the future mothers of the Nation—to adopt the cigarette habit.

Not since the days when public opinion rose in its might and smote the dangerous drug traffic, not since the days when the vendor of harmful nostrums was swept from our streets, has this country witnessed such an orgy of buncombe, quackery, and downright falsehood and fraud as now marks the current campaign promoted by certain cigarette manufacturers to create a vast woman and child market for the use of their product.

In bringing to the attention of my colleagues in Congress a situation which demands strong legislative remedy if the health and welfare of the Nation are not to be increasingly undermined by an evil which promises to be greater than alcohol I desire to make it clear that no attack is intended upon the tobacco growers of our country, many of whom are in the grip of pernicious cigarette-manufacturing interests; that I realize that many tobacco manufacturers, with a due sense of their social obligations, have refrained and are refraining from exploiting public health in the sale of their products; and that the use of tobacco as a moderate indulgence by adult people is not in question. I rise to denounce insidious cigarette campaigns now being promoted by those tobacco manufacturing interests whose only god is profit, whose only bible is the balance sheet, whose only principle is greed. I rise to denounce the unconscionable, heartless, and destructive attempts to exploit the women and youth of our country in the interest of a few powerful tobacco organizations whose rapacity knows no bounds.

Whatever may be said of the moderate indulgence in the use of tobacco it is clear that the issue raised before the country in some of the current cigarette campaigns is the issue raised by urging excessive cigarette smoking; by flaunting appeals to the youth of our country; by misrepresenting established medical and health findings in order to encourage cigarette addiction.

These great cigarette campaigns, into which millions are being poured in order to create new armies of cigarette addicts, have been accompanied by a barrage of the most patent hypocrisy. "There is not the slightest basis, either in this company's advertising or radio broadcasting, for any suggestion that this or any other tobacco company is planning to create a vast child market for cigarettes," George Washington Hill, president of the American Tobacco Co., has protested in the newspapers. "I should be as shocked," he has declared, "as anybody else if a tobacco company should undertake to appeal to adolescents."

What is to be said for such a statement, when, at the very moment that this is written, the American Tobacco Co. dares to flaunt on the billboards of the Nation posters showing an adolescent girl smoking cigarettes?

What is to be said about such a statement when the American Tobacco Co. stands self-convicted before the country for broadcasting tainted testimonials from professional athletes, urging cigarettes as aid to physical prowess, although it has since been forced by innumerable protests addressed to radio stations to discontinue these claims on the air?

What is to be said for such a statement when to this very day the America Tobacco Co. attacks public health by urging young women to maintain slender figures by smoking cigarettes?

For months the gigantic machine of deception and fraud set up by pernicious cigarette interests has been gathering momentum. Under cover of alleged competition—the "newer competition," as Mr. Hill describes it in an article in the June issue of World's Work—the campaign to place a cigarette in the mouth of every woman and youth in the United States has now been extended to every town and village in the country. Mr. Hill's account of the accidental observation that led to the present cigarette campaign is very illuminating. He writes:

I was driving home from my office one afternoon last fall when my car was stopped by a traffic light. A very fat women was standing on the near corner chewing with evident relish on what may have been a pickle, but which I thought of instantly through a natural association of ideas as a sweet.

This had no great significance until a taxicab pulled in between my car and the curb and blocked my view of the fat woman. I found my eyes resting easily on a pretty and very modern flapper whose figure was quite the last word in slimness. The girl took advantage of the halt to produce a long cigarette holder, filled it with a fag, and lighted up.

But pickle or candy—he did not care which—this flash of vision in the brain of the president of the American Tobacco Co. became, we are told, the basis of a $12,000,000 advertising effort in which football coaches were hired to tell the American boy that cigarettes put vim and vigor into the most strenuous of all physical exercises; in which the alleged testimonials of opera singers were used to persuade the American public that cigarette smoke was soothing to the throat; in which current celebrities were made to say that the cigarette habit was a social asset; in which moving-picture actresses, stage stars, and others were paid to tell the American woman that they retained their lovely figures only by smoking cigarettes.

What a pity Mr. Hill's limousine did not take him farther afield. He might have traveled to Atlantic City on May 29 and heard the appalling reports made at the annual convention of the National Tuberculosis Association. Here is how the New York Times of May 30 heads its account of the meeting:

Find tuberculosis gains among girls; physicians of convention lay rise to smoking, late hours, and inadequate diet; victims of "flapper" age; death rate, 50 per cent greater than among boys five years ago, now is shown to be 100 per cent higher.

In any schoolroom he could have seen the dwarfed body of an habitual boy smoker, ruined in health and morals by being led into the cigarette habit at a tender age.

Mr. Hill might have inquired of any reputable physician who could have told him that intestinal catarrh, ulcer, liver hemorrhages, kidney degeneration, chronic bronchitis, heightened blood pressure, palpitation of the heart, pronounced anemia, Bright's disease, neurasthenia, cancer of the mouth and nose, premature senility are but a few of the ailments of which nicotine poisoning stands convicted by the medical profession.

The evil example set by the most powerful factor in the American tobacco industry has been quick to bear fruit. A widespread advertising campaign is now under way that actually features cigarettes as a newly discovered nerve tonic. In many women's colleges resentment has been caused by the free distribution of cigarettes designed to start girl undergraduates on the road to cigarette addiction. Another company sends congratulatory birthday greetings with a carton of cigarettes to boys who have reached 16 years of age. Every temptation that greed can devise is thus placed in the path of our boys and girls.

No wonder that the serious social problems presented by this huge campaign of miseducation have stirred so many elements of our national life. In the Journal of the American Medical Association of December 8, 1928, the campaign is condemned in the following words:

Who would have thought 10 years ago that cigarettes would be sold to the American public * * * actually by insistence on the healthful qualities of certain brands?

That American womanhood passed during the last five years through one of those periodic crazes that have afflicted womankind since the world began is not a secret. Indeed, women everywhere began to cultivate sylphlike figures, dieted themselves to the point of destruction; and tuberculosis rates, particularly for young girls, rose in many communities. * * *

At the same time the manufacturers of Lucky Strike cigarettes having secured, they claim, statements from 20,678 physicians that Lucky Strikes were less irritating than other cigarettes, are promulgating a campaign in which they assert that these cigarettes do not cut the wind or impair the physical condition, and that Lucky Strikes satisfy the longing for things that make you fat without interfering with a normal appetite for health foods. To which the simple reply is made, "Hooey."

The human appetite is a delicate mechanism and the attempt to urge that it be aborted or destroyed by the regular use of tobacco is essentially vicious.

The Life Extension Institute, whose board is made up of leading American physicians and public-health authorities, is definitely on record with regard to tobacco. In its bulletin headed What it Costs to Smoke Tobacco, it is declared that among 5,000 smokers examined who showed various physical impairments requiring medical supervision, 6 per cent suffered from thickened arteries, 15 per cent from rapid pulse, 15 per cent from decayed teeth, 13 per cent from gum recession, 27 per cent from marked pyorrhea. The Life Extension Institute likewise reports college tests which indicate lower scholarship records by students who inhaled tobacco fumes. The bulletin includes the following statement:

How many deaths have occurred from typhoid and from surgical operations upon those who have injured the nervous mechanism of their circulation by tobacco will never be known. But surgeons have noted instances of failure to rally after operations among cigarette smokers.

No less significant is the fact that at a time when powerful cigarette interests are screaming from every billboard and through millions of radio sets their pernicious advice to the women of our country to maintain a slender figure by smoking cigarettes, the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. finds it necessary to warn its policyholders as well as the general public against such harmful dieting.

The desire for extreme slenderness—is bringing serious consequences. When stimulants, sedatives, or drugs are substituted for the food needed to build health or strength the penalty is certain and severe—frequently broken health and sometimes death.

The bibliography of those who have condemned the excessive use of tobacco includes some of the greatest names in medicine and public health in the history of this country—Dr. Alexander Lambert; the late Doctor Janeway, of Johns Hopkins Hospital; Doctor Sheldon, of Cornell University Medical College; Dr. Eugene L. Fisk, medical director of the Life Extension Institute; Professor Pack, of the University of Utah; Prof. M. V. O'Shea, of the University of Wisconsin; Dr. Arthur Deramont Bush, of the University of Vermont; Prof. W. P. Lombard, professor of physiology of the University of Michigan; Dr. Harvey W. Wiley; Dr. Samuel G. Dixon, commissioner of health for Pennsylvania; Dr. J. H. Kellogg, superintendent of Battle Creek Sanitarium; Dr. Francis Dowling; Dr. Elbert H. Burr; Dean Hornell, of Ohio Wesleyan University; Dr. Henry Churchill King, president of Oberlin College; Robert Lee Bates, of the pyschological laboratory of Johns Hopkins University; Dr. L. Pierce Clark, consulting neurologist of the Manhattan State Hospital, New York. A host of other investigators might be mentioned.

But a no more pertinent, timely, and measured condemnation of the current cigarette propaganda can be quoted than the statement made on June 7, 1929, by Dr. Hugh S. Cumming, Surgeon General United States Public Health Service. He said:

The cigarette habit indulged in to excess by women tends to cause nervousness and insomnia. If American women generally contract the habit, as reports now indicate they are doing, the entire Nation will suffer. The physical tone of the whole Nation will be lowered. The number of American women who are smoking cigarettes to-day is amazing. The habit harms a woman more than it does a man. The woman's nervous system is more highly organized than the man's. The reaction is, therefore, more intense. It may ruin her complexion, causing it to become gradually ashen. Propaganda urging that tobacco be used as a substitute for food is not in the interest of public health, and if practiced widely by young persons will be positively harmful.

It was natural that the great voice of the pulpit should rise in indignant protest against the appalling exploitation of the health and welfare of the American family inherent in the current cigarette propaganda.

The board of Christian education of the Presbyterian Church in the United States; the board of temperance, prohibition, and public morals of the Methodist Episcopal Church; the board of education of the Reformed Church in America, as well as the Congregational Church extension boards, have denounced the insidious cigarette campaign. The United Presbyterian General Assembly, meeting at Pittsburgh on June 4, 1929, protested in a resolution against the "boldness of the tobacco interests in advertising their wares over the radio, in newspapers, and on billboards."

The World Society of Christian Endeavor, through its president, Dr. Daniel E. Poling, of New York, has issued a stirring call for action. Here is what Doctor Poling says in his open letter addressed to the 1,800 branches of that great organization:

I speak first of all—

as an American father who, with an American father's concern for his own children and for all children challenges current cigarette advertising. I speak in the second place as the president of the World Society of Christian Endeavor; as the representative, therefore, of more than 4,000,000 young people who share with me the deep hostility against this advertising. * * * Womanhood is being exploited for trade. Excess is being encouraged as efficiency. Boys and girls in the crucial years of adolescence are being led to stunt their bodies and dwarf their minds.

Nor is the campaign announced by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union against such untruthful and misleading cigarette appeals any less decisive.

Nearly every leading organization concerned with the education of our young, with juvenile delinquency, with the maintenance of public morals, has taken some action to protest against the wholesale attempt to nicotinize the youth of our Nation, including the National Education Association, the American Federation of Teachers, the American Eugenics Society, the American Child Welfare Association, and numerous parent-teacher associations throughout the country.

The General Federation of Women's Clubs declared its views on cigarette smoking at its fifteenth biennial convention in a resolution reading as follows:

Whereas the cigarette is a serious menace to the physical, mental, moral, and spiritual development of the youth of our country: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the women of the General Federation go on record as favoring an educational propaganda against cigarettes, and further indorsing State legislation prohibiting the furnishing of cigarettes to minors.

The contemptuous term "tainted testimonials," coined by leading advertising men to describe the purchased testimony offered by cigarette interests, is sufficient indication of the way in which American business generally views this campaign. What quackery! Overnight, as it were, the old "coffin nail," against which we solemnly warned our young, became the sovereign good. Are you suffering from sore throat? Gargle with cigarettes—there is not a cough in them. Would you be slender and charming? Substitute cigarettes for wholesome foods. Would you gain laurels on the football field? Cigarettes will give you vim and vigor. Would you be a great general? Forget that an army marches on its stomach—it marches on cigarette stubs. Would you be a popular sea hero? Throw the life preservers overboard—and place your trust in a package of cigarettes.

It is a high affirmation of American business standards that the Association of National Advertisers, including the most reputable business interests of the country, at its meeting in French Lick, Ind., during the week of May 27, passed the following resolution repudiating the tainted testimonials now used in the nation-wide cigarette propaganda on the billboards and in the magazines:

Whereas we believe that advertising, in order to be lastingly effective and profitable, must not only be truthful and sincere but must also appear to be; and

Whereas, this being our belief, it naturally follows that we view with disapproval the use of the so-called paid testimonials: Therefore be it

Resolved, That our members continue carefully to scrutinize their own advertising from this standpoint, and that they express this opinion of the association on insincere testimonials, gratuitous or paid for, at every opportunity.

It is important to note, also, that out of 786 advertising agencies and national advertisers which answered a questionnaire from the National Better Business Bureau, 581 expressed emphatic condemnation of tainted testimonial advertising. The cigarette campaign, it is evident, is a libel—a great libel—upon American business ethics.

Lest there be those who may think that the great public interest in this problem is beyond the proportions of the issue involved, let us glance for a moment at the enormous growth of the cigarette habit since the vast machinery of public exploitation has been set in motion by the cigarette industry. Here is a table showing the—

Consumption of cigars, cigarettes, and other manufactures[1] in the United States, 1913–1927; January–July, 1928

They are converted to thousands by assuming 1,000 cigars to weigh 20 pounds and 1,000 cigarettes to weigh 3 pounds. The figures for production from 1916 include manufactures in bonded warehouses, not available prior to that time.

It will be noted that the consumption of cigarettes in the United States has now reached the enormous total of 102,000,000,000, an increase of 118 per cent during the last decade. In 1901 only 3,000,000,000 cigarettes were consumed by the American public. The increase from that figure to the present annual rate of consumption is more than 3,000 per cent.

What is the bill which the Nation pays for this huge tobacco consumption? In terms of premature death, of disease, of ill health, of lessened efficiency, of loss through fires started by smoking, the sum is incalculable. In the price paid directly in dollars and cents, the following comparative table, compiled by the National Education Association for the year 1926, based on United States Treasury Department tax returns, is illuminating:

Cost of public schools, elementary, secondary, and collegiate, in 1926	$2,255,251,327
Spent for tobacco, 1926	2,087,110,000
Spent for life insurance, 1926	2,624,000,000

It is evident that there is a deeper, more sinister purpose behind the vast machinery of deception created for the cigarette campaign than the "new competition" by which the American Tobacco Co. seeks to cloak its attack upon public health. The cigarette interests concerned in the present campaign are playing for larger stakes than a mere share of the farmer's, the dairy producer's, the baker's, the ice cream man's, the candy man's, the sugar man's, and the grocer's dollar. All producers and purveyors of raw and manufactured food products are well within their rights in attacking such a campaign of unfair competition, when the American public is urged, on the basis of misleading and destructive health claims, to substitute cigarettes for wholesome foods. Farm groups and farm organizations, at a time when Congress is legislating on important problems of farm relief, are fully justified in denouncing a campaign which seeks to increase harmful and destructive dieting habits that have done so much to reduce the per capita consumption of foodstuffs in the United States.

What pernicious tobacco interests really see is the vacant throne created by the deposition of King Alcohol. And well they may. Let me quote from the second volume of Modern Medicine, by Doctors Osler and McCrea:

Many patients (alcoholic) in whom the attack seems to be without exciting cause, if questioned closely, are found to be great tobacco smokers, and the cause of their outbreak is really a recurrent poisoning by tobacco. Usually the history is that they smoke, especially the cigarette smokers, incessantly and to excess. This finally makes them nervous. Then they smoke more to quiet their nervousness until finally they seek another narcotic to quiet them; then they naturally turn to alcohol.

The link between the drink habit and the drug habit inherent in excessive cigarette smoking has been made clear repeatedly by medical authority.

The insidious cigarette campaign now in progress concerns every father and every mother of children in the country; every man and woman responsible for the education of the young; every medical and health authority; every employer of labor; every worker whose efficiency is decreased by the cigarette habit. It concerns every welfare organization, every tuberculosis association, every life and fire insurance company, every property owner, every juvenile protective association.

Are we to be as helpless as China, where the British-American Tobacco Co. has so successfully introduced the general habit of cigarette addiction? The late President Emeritus Charles W. Eliot, of Harvard, was eyewitness to the campaign there, which called for the free distribution of billions of cigarettes. "Thus the Christian nations," he exclaimed, "confer the benefits of civilization on the Orient!"

Are the interests of public health here to be completely overridden when this same American Tobacco Co., a heavy advertiser in France, does not dare to offer its cigarettes as a substitute for food products in that country?

The challenge hurled at public health, public welfare, and business decency by destructive cigarette interests must be fairly and squarely met. State legislation is now attempting to cope with the problem.

In Illinois a bill has been introduced in the general assembly for the restriction of advertising which urges young people to smoke cigarettes. A similar measure is before the senate of that State.

A bill to prevent the advertising of cigarettes through the radio and on the billboards, introduced February 12, is now before the Idaho State Senate.

The laws of the State of Maine have put tobacco in the class with poisons and narcotic drugs.

In the State of West Virginia tobacco is placed by statute in the class with opium.

In Michigan a bill has been offered in the lower house against advertising designed to promote the sale of cigarettes to women.

In the State of Utah billboard and street-car advertising of cigarettes has been made a misdemeanor.

In Mississippi Dr. W. F. Bond, State superintendent of education, is calling for a nation-wide effort to combat the millions of dollars that cigarette manufacturers are spending for propaganda.

In California schools are required by law to instruct children as to the injurious effects of tobacco, and the sale of cigarettes is forbidden to any girl or boy under the age of 18.

In practically every other State of the Union public disapproval of cigarettes for minors is expressed by law in one form or another.

At the present time intensive efforts are in progress in various communities against the billboard advertising of the American Tobacco Co., which has dared to feature a poster picturing a girl of tender years actually smoking cigarettes. These community efforts are now in progress in Arkansas, California, Colorado, Idaho, Illinois, Iowa, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, New York, North Carolina, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Dakota, Texas, Tennessee, Washington, and other States.

But the time has come for the Congress of the United States to take definite action. The sale of cigarettes, promoted upon a national scale, is properly a subject of interstate commerce. Cigarettes and many tobacco products are nationally advertised in media which in most cases are subject only to Federal control.

I am convinced that the present great license assumed by certain cigarette interests would have been impossible if tobacco and tobacco products were subject to the same regulations that apply to basic food products or to drug products, in which latter classification tobacco properly belongs.

Only a fine technicality permits tobacco at the present time to escape proper classification and control. In section 6 of the food and drugs act drugs are defined as "all medicines and preparations recognized in the United States Pharmacopœia, or National Formulary, for internal and external use."

In the past tobacco has been listed in the pharmacopœia as a drug, but was dropped in the last revision of this work with the following explanation, which makes the reason for omission self-evident:

Tobacco, the leaves of Nicotiana tabacum, was official in former pharmacopœias, but was dropped in the last revision. It was formerly highly esteemed as a vulnerary, but is little used as a drug by intelligent physicians. A decoction of tobacco in which corrosive sublimate has been dissolved makes a satisfactory bedbug poison.

Although tobacco is thus officially banned as a remedy, despite the claims of the American Tobacco Co. that it promotes the health of the user, the fact remains that tobacco contains many injurious drugs, including nicotine, pyridin, carbolic acid, ammonia, marsh gas, and other products.

While basic food products upon which our great agricultural population is dependent, while any drugs and medicines the use or abuse of which may have a bearing upon public health, are under the Food, Drug, and Insecticide Administration of the United States Department of Agriculture, tobacco, the abuse of which has become a national problem, is not included within the regulations of the food and drugs act, for the merely technical reason that since modern medical practice has abandoned it as a remedy it is no longer listed in the pharmacopœia.

The bill which I now lay before this body, designed to protect public health and public welfare from the further exploitation of irresponsible cigarette interests, provides:

(a) For the inclusion of tobacco and tobacco products within the scope of the food and drugs act.

(b) For the amendment of the food and drugs act so that claims made for food and drug products in any advertising medium subject to interstate-commerce control should be under the same strict regulation now applied to labels or other descriptive matter on, within, or around the container in which the product is packed.

Public interest, efficiency, and economy require the amendment to the food and drugs act empowering the Food, Drug, and Insecticide Administration to proceed against any manufacturer of a drug or food product whose public sales claims are partly or wholly unjustified by the facts. The Federal Trade Commission, which now cooperates with the Food, Drug, and Insecticide Administration, has no laboratory facilities and no adequate corps of investigators. Procedure is slow, therefore, and in matters affecting public health vast harm may be done before the Federal Trade Commission is ready or able to take action in the premises.

This measure is proposed, therefore, to remedy this situation and in order to avoid duplication, the overlapping of authority, the diffusion of responsibility, and the dual expense to the Government.

The bill which I now send to the Clerk's desk is designed to meet a problem of such great and immediate importance to public health and of such vital interest to our agricultural producers and business men that I am confident it deserves and will obtain the support of every Member of Congress.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Utah a question before he takes his seat?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. HARRISON. I did not hear all of the Senator's speech. Did the Senator ask for the appointment of a commission to make an investigation of this matter?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I did not. I asked that tobacco be put under the food and drugs act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be received and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The bill (S. 1468) to amend the food and drugs act of June 30, 1906, by extending its provisions to tobacco and tobacco products was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I suggest and ask that the bill introduced by the Senator from Utah be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the manufacture and sale of tobacco products are matters that affect the public health and welfare of millions of our population; and

Whereas various drug products are contained in tobacco; and

Whereas, because tobacco now abandoned as a medicinal agent is no longer classified as a drug, and thus escapes, through a technicality, the controls set up in the food and drugs act adopted by Congress for the protection of public health; and

Whereas public health would be better served by empowering the Food, Drug, and Insecticide Administration of the United States Department of Agriculture to exercise the same control over false and deceptive statements made through advertising media, that it now exerts in preventing the use of false and deceptive statements, designs, or devices made on containers or labels: Now, therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That the food and drugs act, June 30, 1906, as amended August 23, 1912; March 3, 1913; March 4, 1913; July 24, 1919; and January 18, 1927, be, and is hereby, further amended as follows:

The words "food or drug," "food or drugs," or "food and drugs," as the case may be, wherever they occur in sections 1, 2, 3, 4, and 11 of the act of June 30, 1906 (34 Stat. 768), as amended, are changed to read "food, drug, tobacco, or tobacco products."

SEC. 2. Section 6 of the act of June 30, 1906 (34 Stat. 768), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"The term 'tobacco' means the leaves of the plant Nicotiana tabacum. The term 'tobacco products' means the products from tobacco prepared for smoking, chewing, or snuffing."

SEC. 3. Section 7 of the act of June 30, 1906 (34 Stat. 768), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"In the case of tobacco:

"If it contains any added deleterious or added poisonous substance."

SEC. 4. The first general paragraph of section 8 of the act of June 30, 1906 (34 Stat. 768), is amended to read as follows:

"That the term 'misbranded,' as used herein, shall apply to all drugs, articles of food, tobacco or tobacco products, or articles which enter into the composition of food or tobacco products, the package or label of which shall bear any statement, design, or device regarding such article, or the ingredients or substances contained therein, which shall be false or misleading in any particular, and of any food, drug products, tobacco or tobacco products which is falsely branded as to State, Territory, or country in which it is manufactured or produced."

SEC. 5. Section 8 of the act of June 30, 1906 (34 Stat. 768), is hereby further amended by adding immediately following paragraph third of the section beginning "in case of drugs," the following new paragraph:

"Fourth. If, in any manner or by any means whatsoever, it or they, or the ingredients or substances contained therein, are falsely or deceptively advertised, represented, or described, or if the curative or therapeutic effects of a product or the ingredients or substances contained therein are falsely and fraudulently advertised, represented, or described."

SEC. 6. Section 8 of the act of June 30, 1906 (34 Stat. 768), is hereby further amended by adding immediately following at the end of the second proviso of paragraph 4 "in the case of food" a new paragraph as follows:

"Fifth. If, in any manner or by any means whatsoever, it or they or the ingredients or substances contained therein are falsely or deceptively advertised, represented, or described."

SEC. 7. Section 8 of the act of June 30, 1906 (34 Stat. 768), as amended, is further amended by adding immediately after the complete new section dealing with drugs the following new section dealing with tobacco or tobacco products:

"In the case of tobacco or tobacco products.

"First. If labeled or branded so as to deceive or mislead the purchaser or purport to be a foreign product when not so or if the contents of the package as originally put up shall have been removed in whole or in part or other contents shall have been placed in such package.

"Second. If the package containing it or them or its or their label shall bear or contain any statement, design, or device regarding the ingredients or substances contained therein which statement, design, or device shall be false or misleading in any particular.

"Third. If, in any manner or by any means whatsoever, it or they or the ingredients or substances contained therein are falsely or deceptively advertised, represented, or described."

SEC. 8. The words "food, drug, or liquor" in the first line of section 10 of the act of June 30, 1906 (34 Stat. 768), be changed to read "food, drug, liquor, tobacco, or tobacco products."

PUBLIC SAFETY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I was very happy to hear the Senator from Utah. I have never before known him to express himself in favor of doing anything that was for the public health; but, since we are on that subject, may I ask what has become of the resolution which passed the Senate three or four weeks ago calling on the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for certain information regarding the rules and regulations in force requiring the opening outward of the doors of all public buildings, the application of fire escapes, the care of explosives and inflammable materials, and other similar matters relating to the public safety? Have we had a reply as yet to that resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No reply has yet been received.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I express the hope that the commissioners will heed this request of the Senate, and at a very early date give us the information called for. We do not wish to have a repetition in this city of the terrible accident that happened in Cleveland; and I think we should know whether or not the commissioners are taking all the steps necessary to guard against such a calamity, or a similar one.

PROPOSED FEDERAL CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

Mr. LA FOLLETTE presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

STATE OF WISCONSIN.

Senate Joint Resolution 65

Joint resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to call a convention for the purpose of proposing amendments to the United States Constitution

Whereas Article V of the United States Constitution provides for the calling of a convention to propose amendments to such Constitution; and

Whereas other States have in the past asked that such a convention be called; and

Whereas there are sections of the United States Constitution that should be amended: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin hereby earnestly requests and petitions Congress to call a convention for proposing amendments to the United States Constitution; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution, properly attested, be forwarded to the presiding officers of both Houses of Congress, to the presiding officers of the legislatures of the other States, and to the Wisconsin Senators and Representatives in Congress.

ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I have had some correspondence with the Middlesex County Council of the American Legion and the Director of the Veterans' Bureau with reference to the subject of veterans' adjusted-service certificates and loans thereon, which I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Finance Committee.

There being no objection, the correspondence was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MIDDLESEX COUNTY COUNCIL,
DEPARTMENT OF MASSACHUSETTS,
THE AMERICAN LEGION,
May 29, 1929.

HON. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WALSH: In accordance with the vote of the Middlesex County Council, the American Legion, in regular meeting assembled at Malden, Mass., on May 12, 1929, I am transmitting to you herewith a copy of the resolution adopted by the council on the subject of the veterans adjusted-service certificates and loans thereon.

Respectfully yours,

DANIEL J. DOHERTY,
Secretary Middlesex County Council.

377 MAIN STREET, Woburn, Mass.

Resolution

Whereas thousands of Massachusetts World War veterans who pledged their adjusted-service certificates with national banks in this State as collateral for loans on said policies prior to the time that Congress authorized the Veterans' Bureau to make loans direct to veterans have been unable to meet their notes when due at said banks; and

Whereas Massachusetts national banks holding notes which were defaulted by the makers at due date have forwarded such notes, together with the respective adjusted-service certificates pledged as security for the loans, to the central office of the Veterans' Bureau at Washington, in accordance with existing law as enacted by Congress, in order that said banks could recover from the Treasurer of the United States the amount of defaulted loan and interest; and

Whereas the Director of the Veterans' Bureau at Washington now holds and will continue to hold thousands of such unredeemed policies until the veterans repay the amount of principal and interest due, thus forcing the veterans to deal directly with the central office of the Veterans' Bureau, in accordance with existing law, in the matter of additional loans, an arrangement which is causing considerable delay and ofttimes hardship to the policy owners who are forced to seek additional loans: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That Middlesex County Council, Department of Massachusetts, the American Legion, in quarterly meeting assembled at Malden, May 12, 1929, does unanimously request the return to the regional offices of the Veterans' Bureau in the territories where their owners reside of all adjusted-service certificates now held by the director in Washington, for the reason that owners of such policies are entitled to the same service and privileges as are veterans who secured loans through the Veterans' Bureau and whose policies are retained in the regional office making the loan; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the department commander and the national legislative committee of the American Legion, the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau, and the Members of Congress from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

Respectfully submitted.

JOHN J. WALSH,
Past County Commander,
Member Department Committee on Compensation and Insurance.

MAY 12, 1929.

UNITED STATES VETERANS' BUREAU,
Washington, June 7, 1929.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WALSH: With reference to your letter of June 4, 1929, forwarding resolution from the Middlesex County (Mass.) Council of the American Legion in connection with the decentralization of the loan functions as they pertain to notes which have been redeemed from the banks and deposited in the central office, I wish to inform you that this matter has been gone into very thoroughly, and it is not thought practicable to make loans on such certificates through the regional offices.

The principal reason for not attempting to decentralize the notes redeemed by banks is that many of the borrowers are so persistently itinerant as to make it impossible to determine their whereabouts; thus it is reasonable to suppose that a large percentage of the makers of the notes are not now resident within the jurisdiction of the regional office in whose territory the original note was executed. It is interesting to note in this connection that approximately 20 per cent of the notices sent to veterans informing them of the redemption of their notes from banks are returned to the bureau unclaimed, indicating how transient the veterans are. Also it is felt that the certificates can be safeguarded better in the central office than in the regional offices because of the better physical facilities for protection available in the central office.

The proposition has been advanced that the certificates should be decentralized when an application for a new loan is made, but it is felt that this action would not be beneficial to the applicant for the new loan because a check could be drawn in the central office and dispatched much more quickly than the case could be decentralized and the check dispatched from the regional office.

Copy of this communication and the resolution forwarded by you are inclosed.

Very truly yours,

FRANK T. HINES, Director.

On motion of Mr. FRAZIER, the resolution (S. Res. 69) establishing the Senate Mississippi engineering advisory board was taken from the table and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 13) to print and bind the proceedings in Congress together with the proceedings at the unveiling in Statuary Hall of the statue of Wade Hampton presented by the State of South Carolina.

AMERICAN HOSPITAL OF PARIS

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I report back favorably without amendment from the Committee on the Judiciary the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 73) to amend the act entitled "An act to incorporate the American Hospital of Paris," approved January 30, 1913.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What is the object of the joint resolution?

Mr. NORRIS. It is a joint resolution amending the act of Congress incorporating the American Hospital of Paris. Under the original act, the act of June 30, 1913, the hospital was limited to hold property not exceeding a million dollars in value. This would amend that one item by fixing the amount at $8,000,000 instead of $2,000,000.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the joint resolution will be received.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution. I may state that the hospital is just beginning a campaign for funds for its nurses' home, and has been offered a large contribution to that end. The joint resolution would have the effect of allowing the hospital authorities to accept that contribution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the proviso contained in section 2 of the act entitled "An act to incorporate the American Hospital of Paris," approved January 30, 1913, is amended to read as follows: "Provided, That the total value of the property owned at any one time by the said corporation shall not exceed $8,000,000."

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FARM RELIEF—CONFERENCE REPORT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1) to establish a Federal farm board to promote the effective merchandising of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce, and to place agriculture on a basis of economic equality with other industries.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] desires to address the Senate at this time. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

George	McKellar	Smith

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the matter which now divides us here is the debenture amendment to the farm relief bill. I want to discuss that subject, and from the viewpoint of one who believes in a protective tariff.

I assume that we are all deeply interested in finding some immediate and effective relief for agriculture. Those of us who are advocates of the debenture feel that it can be demonstrated that that would bring immediate and effective relief.

It is estimated that there are about 6,500,000 farmers in the United States. They represent a population of some 30,000,000 people. It is because of those people that we are here assembled. It was because of their condition that this extraordinary session was called.

It has been estimated by those who have given particular study to the subject that the average income of the farmer of the United States is $736 per annum. The American farmer is upon the lowest rung of the ladder in our economic life. The man who represents the primary industry of the United States receives less compensation, under present conditions, for his annual efforts than the tramp employee.

When we take into consideration that the farmer has a family to rear, children to educate and clothe, and that he must fit them for the obligations of citizenship we must recognize that with that small income he is very near to peasantry. The farmer's is a condition which ought to move, and I think does move, the Congress to give the most candid consideration and the most unbiased thought touching any proposal which may be made for his relief.

In addition to his low income, in estimating his condition we must take into consideration the amount of taxes he has to pay. Prior to the war about one-tenth of the farmer's income, less other expenses, was taken for taxes. At the present time about one-third of his income is required to pay for government. The farmer's taxes are doubled about every 12 years. During the last 18 years that ratio has been maintained.

Aside from the amount which the farmer must pay, it is now well demonstrated that his proportion of taxes, measured by his income, is from 4 to 5 per cent larger than that of any other sector of the community. The farmer's property is in sight. He escapes not at all the vigilant eye of the tax collector, and he must meet in full his obligation as a citizen toward his Government.

When the farmer raises his crop, he must reach the market. Freight rates since the war have increased about 60 per cent, and the recent decision of our highest court indicates that that increase is going to be accelerated.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. If I understand the Senator, a little while ago he was comparing the income of the farmer with the income of the laborer in the manufacturing industries. Am I right about that?

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is correct.

Mr. SIMMONS. Has the Senator taken into consideration the fact that the laborer in the factory derives his income entirely from his labor, but in the case of the farmer he derives his income from his labor plus his land?

Mr. CARAWAY. And his family's labor.

Mr. SIMMONS. Therefore, in making the comparison, we should consider that the farmer must pay out of his income something to represent the interest upon his investment. In other words, he has an investment in addition to his labor, while the mill operative has no investment in the plant in which he works; his income represents simply his labor. I think that makes the disparity in the comparison much worse for the farmer.

Mr. BORAH. I thank the Senator for his suggestion. I should also have said that the figures which I gave included food and fuel, and what we might call the furnishings of the farm.

But in addition to the situation thus indicated by these figures there has been imported into this country and coming into our market on the average for the last four or five years something like $2,500,000,000 worth of products which the American farmer is prepared to produce. He is brought in direct competition with the cheapest labor in the world, at least that is true in some of the countries producing the things which come in competition with him. He is in competition with cheaper freight rates. He is in competition with people who have a lower cost of living. He is in competition with those who have a much lower wage scale to pay. The farmer to-day, outside of three or four leading commodities of which we now produce a surplus, is in direct competition with the producers who employ cheap labor, have cheaper freight rates, and in some instances newer and cheaper lands.

Mr. President, this is the condition of agriculture. This it is that brought us here in extraordinary session. These are the people whom we are here to serve if it is possible to do so. I repeat, I must assume, with such a condition of affairs confronting us, with agriculture presenting the depression which it does, that no man is going to hesitate to support a proposition which it can be demonstrated will bring relief to that distress. I am not going to assume that the mind of anyone is closed upon the subject. Tom Paine, I think it was, said that arguing to those who had abdicated their reason is like giving medicine to the dead. But I shall assume, and particularly for the party of which I am a member and which has the responsibility for this program, that if a remedy can be presented which will give assurance of relief that remedy will be accepted at the hands of the Congress.

Mr. President, it is just about a year ago that we were assembling at Kansas City. The individual who was most in our minds as we assembled at Kansas City was the American farmer. We were well aware of his condition and we were also aware of the fact that so far no satisfactory remedy had been proposed, or accepted, at least, for his relief. Not only as a political proposition and from political considerations, but I think as a matter of justice to this primary industry, the convention which assembled undertook to deal with the matter in sincerity.

I am going to read a few paragraphs from the declaration of the party at that time:

> The agricultural problem is national in scope, and as such is recognized by the Republican Party, which pledges its strength and energy to the solution of the same.

Something has been said, and often repeated in the Republican press, to the effect that the debenture plan was not specifically discussed in the campaign, as if that closed the controversy so far as the Congress is concerned. But the Republican Party pledged itself to the solution of the problem. Will anyone contend that if the solution is at hand we are foreclosed by the fact that it was not specifically discussed in the campaign? Is the condition of the farmer and the relief of the farmer to be weighed against the technical proposition that it might not have been discussed as one of the issues of the campaign? We were pledged to solve the problem and that covers any plan which will solve it.

> Realizing that many farmers are facing problems more difficult than those which are the portion of many other basic industries, the party is anxious to aid in every way possible.

The subcommittee of which I had the honor to be a member did not know any more than we know the specific adequate and sufficient remedy for farm relief. We realized, I think as all realized, that different remedies may be applied, which as a whole may bring relief, but no man could put his finger upon the specific remedy which would serve as a panacea for all the evils which afflict agriculture, and therefore we, representing the great party of which we were delegates in that convention, pledged ourselves to do everything possible for the relief of the farmer. We were pledged to any plan which would bring relief. That was the pledge which was made by the party as it went into the campaign of 1928. Everything that could be devised that was reasonable and effective, wise and efficient, was the pledge of the Republican Party made at Kansas City on the 15th day of June, 1928.

> The Republican Party pledges itself to the development and enactment of measures which will place the agricultural interests of America on a basis of economic equality with other industries to insure its prosperity and success.

Let us ponder for a moment that pledge. We pledged ourselves to do everything possible to place agriculture upon an economic equality with other industries of the United States; and the supporters of the debenture plan in the Senate will maintain, and we think we will be able to show, that the debenture is one of the indispensable steps to placing the farmer upon an economic equality with the other industries so long as other industries are enjoying the protection which we give them through the tariff.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ALLEN. Was anything said in the making of the platform at the Kansas City convention touching the advisability of putting the debenture plan in the platform?

Mr. BORAH. I beg the Senator's pardon; I did not understand his question.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator was discussing the declaration of principles at the Kansas City convention. Was anything suggested about mentioning the debenture plan in the platform? Was there anything said in the making of the agricultural plank which led to the feeling at that time that the delegates would like to have it suggested to them in the convention?

Mr. BORAH. I could not say whether anything was said that would lead the delegates to think so. Some of us who sat upon the subcommittee had in mind the debenture, but we did not put it in the platform. But let me say to the Senator from Kansas that the pledge which we made and upon which we stood in the campaign and which the Senator from Kansas advocated in the campaign, pledges us to do everything necessary that we can to place the farmer upon an economic equality with other industries and what I propose to do later if I may is to demonstrate that the debenture plan is essential to that program, and if it is essential to the program we will certainly not violate the general pledge that we made to do the thing because we did not specifically mention it at the time.

Mr. ALLEN. I have no quarrel with the Senator's declaration that this is a matter of mere opinion as to whether or not it is a good thing. I merely wanted to get from him the admission that the failure of the committee to include the debenture plank was not a violation of our party theory or our party program.

Mr. BORAH. I do not agree with the Senator upon that matter. I maintain that if the debenture plan is essential to placing the farmer upon an economic equality with other industries which enjoy the protective tariff, then our failure to do it would be a profound violation of the pledge we made. Our pledge was to give him economic equality and if the debenture will do that, it is within the pledge.

Mr. ALLEN. I merely called attention to the fact that we did not hold forth and put in the platform that the debenture was a part of the program through which we hoped to relieve the farmer.

Mr. BORAH. But we knew perfectly well there was a vast organization of farmers in the United States who had declared for the debenture, and we appealed to those farmers to support the Republican Party upon the ground that we were pledged to do whatever was necessary to place the farmer upon an economic equality with other members of industry.

Mr. ALLEN. Why, then, did not the Senator advocate putting that idea in the platform? He surely did not hope to fool those people?

Mr. BORAH. No; I did not desire to fool them because I put in the platform that which covers it under any possible conception if we demonstrate that it is the wise and effective thing to do.

Mr. ALLEN. That still remains a matter of opinion.

Mr. BORAH. I presume it is.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. I desire to call attention to a misstatement in reference to the Committee on Agriculture. The agricultural committee did include the debenture plan as a part of the remedy for the relief of agriculture and it was reported by the committee in the bill, and in the first instance it was reported unanimously.

Mr. SIMMONS and Mr. WALSH of Montana addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BORAH. I think the Senator from North Carolina rose first. I yield to him.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator declared in his party platform that it was the duty of the party to take action upon the view and to the end of bringing about parity between agriculture and manufacture. I merely wish to ask the Senator if he specified any other method or did he not leave to the Congress the determination of the method to accomplish this purpose?

Mr. BORAH. In a general way we did. I am going to call attention to one or two paragraphs which are a little more specific.

I yield now to the Senator from Montana if he desires.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The question I desired to address to the Senator was the same one asked by the Senator from North Carolina. I do not recall that any other specific form of relief was mentioned in the platform.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, there was no attempt either in the convention or in the campaign to be specific as to remedy. It was a general proposition and had to be largely for the reason that nobody had a specific remedy.

Mr. ALLEN. And yet, if the Senator will yield again——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ALLEN. Specific reference was made to stabilization through the Federal farm board.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; and I think that it will be a part of the Federal farm board's business, if the debenture is adopted, to help make it work. It is a part of any sound scheme of stabilization.

At page 117 of this interesting volume is the following:

> The Republican Party believes that the home market built up under a protective policy belongs to the American farmer, and it pledges its support to legislation which will give this market to him to the full extent of his ability to supply it.

I am familiar with the author of that sentence and it was placed in the platform as a specific pledge to give the home market to the American farmer for those things of which we do not produce a surplus, which we produce in the competitive world. There were two ideas in the minds of everyone dealing with the subject of farm relief. One was the individual who was producing commodities of which we produce a surplus, and the other was the large number of farmers who are producing commodities of which we are not exporters. We had in mind first to deal with those who were producing the commodities of which we produce a surplus, and secondly that class of farmers who must depend upon the home market.

The Democratic Party, I may say, has in its platform this declaration:

> It is a fundamental principle of the party that such tariffs as are levied must not discriminate against any industry, class, or section. Therefore we pledge that in its tariff policy the Democratic Party will insist upon equality of treatment between agriculture and other industries.

The idea which was running through the minds of both conventions and the leaders of both parties was, if possible, through legislation to bring about economic equality between the farmers and the industries of the United States. There was a feeling that the industries had been favored; that under legislation they had had an advantage; there was a further feeling that the American farmer, in order to be placed upon an equality with the industries, must be aided; and both political parties were pledged to that end. We sit here in the Senate of the United States to-day, Democrats and Republicans alike, although arriving at our conclusions over different roads, pledged to put the American farmer upon an equality with industries if it is possible to do so. Will the debenture help to do it? We contend it will.

Men may quibble about other questions, but that proposition was made by both parties and presented to the American people. The real question in the campaign was which party would be most likely to carry into effect this general pledge. The candidate upon the Republican ticket said in his acceptance address:

> The most urgent economic problem in our Nation to-day is in agriculture. It must be solved if we are to bring prosperity and contentment to one-third of our people and to all of our people indirectly. We have pledged ourselves to find a solution.

The solution was not at hand, but we had pledged ourselves to find a solution, and the candidate upon the Republican ticket recognized that fact and dedicated himself to the task of finding a solution. Again Mr. Hoover stated:

> Objection has been made that this program, as laid down by the party platform, may require that several hundred millions of dollars of capital be advanced by the Federal Government without obligation upon the individual farmer. With that objection I have little patience. A nation which is spending $90,000,000,000 a year can well afford an expenditure of a few hundred millions for a workable program that will give to one-third of its population their fair share of the nation's prosperity. * * *

The working out of agricultural relief constitutes the most important obligation of the next administration.

"The working out of agricultural relief"—not that it is here, not that we are presenting, finished and complete, a panacea for all the evils that afflict agriculture; but, recognizing that it was a great unsolved problem, the pledge was made that its solution was the greatest task confronting the incoming administration.

Mr. President, what is the situation on this almost the anniversary of the meeting of the Republican Party at Kansas City? We know the condition of the farmer; we know his situation; we know the distress of agriculture; and we know that the farmer's situation is worse now than it was a year ago. I say, therefore, that the only question presented to you and to me is to find, if we can, a solution of the problem, or to find, if we can, the means which will put the farmer upon an economic equality with the other industries of the country. That is our task. That is our pledge.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield to me for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ALLEN. When the Senator from Idaho makes the statement that agriculture is now in a worse condition than it was a year ago I take it that he refers to the fact that the price of wheat is at a lower point than it was a year ago?

Mr. BORAH. That is one item, but it is only one.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator a question in reference to his judgment as to the operation of the debenture. If the wheat farmers to-day were allowed to export their surplus with the debenture clause in operation, would it bring them relief in the matter of the price of their wheat, both as to that sold in the domestic market and that sold in the foreign market?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am going to discuss the debenture proposition in a few moments, and I hope to express myself in regard to the different phases of it. I desire now to say, however, that I do not regard the immediate price of wheat as a permanent condition with reference to the situation of the farmer. When I say that the farmer's condition is worse than it was a year ago I refer to his general condition, to his economic inequality, and not alone because of the effect of the low price of wheat. I shall come to the debenture proposition a little later.

Mr. President, we in this country live under the protective-tariff system. At the present time there seems to be no probability of its being changed. It is a settled policy, so far as dealing with this particular subject at this time is concerned. For myself, I do not desire to tear down the protective system; I have no desire to destroy it; I believe in that system; I know that it is easily and often abused; I know that it is sometimes used for selfish purposes and not for the national good; but, as that policy was announced by Hamilton and magnificently expounded by Clay, it has proven itself a sound policy for the United States.

As they understood this policy it applied to all the people, stimulating their energies and diversifying their genius and building the Nation as a whole. Unless it does that it is indefensible and intolerable. Unless the protective tariff applies and can be made to apply as a system to the Nation as a whole, then it becomes a special privilege, the result of governmental favor, and is intolerable. I think, Mr. President, that the protective system is being tested at this time. The question is whether it can be made to apply to all the people, assisting the Nation as a whole, or whether it is to be the special privilege or the special advantage of a few.

The American farmer, as I understand his position, does not desire to tear down the protective-tariff system. He has been about the most faithful advocate, considering the meager benefits which he has received, that it has had in its long history. He has no desire, as I understand, to destroy it, but he has a desire to share it, and what he is asking for under the debenture and when he seeks sufficient duties to protect the home market is that he may share the protective system which now obtains in the United States. Those who are advocating the debenture are advocating it as a part of a just system of protection, as a part and parcel of a system which we hope to maintain. They are advocating it in no sense, Mr. President, as a gratuity, as a favor, as a particular gift to the American farmer, but for the purpose, as we pledged we would do, of placing him upon an economic equality with those who are enjoying protection.

Let us not be misled in this contest. Newspapers have crowded their editorials with statements that the farmer is here asking for something from the Treasury. The farmer is asking for no gift; he is asking for equality, and he says the debenture is one of the methods by which he can secure equality. The real issue, therefore, is, Shall we share the protective system? Shall the farmer be brought within that system?

After the vote was taken upon the debenture there was an onslaught of editorial attacks from Republican newspapers upon those who voted for the debenture. I have treated myself to the pleasure of reading over a hundred of those editorials. After one wades through the mass of common, ordinary billingsgate and personal attack and vituperation, two principles seem to emerge from those editorials; they reveal two propositions: First, that they are opposed to the debenture; and, second, that they are opposed to adequate duties upon agricultural products.

Mr. President, if you will study those editorials as they have been published since this fight opened, you will find that they are absolutely against the American farmer sharing the protective-tariff system. I repeat, the real conflict here is as to whether the farmer is going to be permitted to enjoy the system. Those newspapers, first, oppose the debenture; and, second, they oppose any adequate duties to protect the commodities which the American farmer produces in competition with foreign countries.

The editorials declare, as I have said, first against the debenture. Mr. President, a debenture or bounty for agriculture is not a new proposition; it is not a thing lately originated, as has been indicated, for the purpose of embarrassing some one politically. It is a principle as old as the protective tariff system. It is not untried; it has been tried in Germany; England had it for 120 years; other countries have tried it, and in some of them it has proved wonderfully satisfactory. It is neither new nor untried, nor, in my opinion, is it unsound.

I call attention to a few paragraphs in the report of Mr. Hamilton on industry and commerce. Mr. Hamilton was really the author of the protective system, although, perhaps, later advocates dwelt more extensively upon the subject and expounded it more in detail. As to whether a bounty as a part of the protective tariff system is any less unsound or any different in principle than the protective system, let us consult the man who was one of the great constructive geniuses in the whole history and science of government. I shall content myself to-day with Hamilton's views and argument. I shall not at this time seek to amplify or comment at length on them. I rest my case with Hamilton.

Speaking of "protective duties—or duties on those foreign articles which are the rivals of the domestic ones intended to be encouraged"—he said:

Duties of this nature evidently amount to a virtual bounty on the domestic fabrics; since, by enhancing the charges on foreign articles, they enable the national manufacturers to undersell all their foreign competitors.

Now, what is the effect of a protective tariff? It has the effect of foregoing a certain amount of revenue in order to build up a particular industry. We favor a particular industry, and favor it to the extent of raising the tariff so high that less revenue comes in than would come in if it were upon a tariff-for-revenue basis. And so Mr. Hamilton correctly said that the effect of a protective tariff is that of a bounty, the nature of it is that of a bounty, for the reason that through the operation and favor of the Government the individual receives a benefit which he otherwise would not receive if it were laid purely as a taxing matter.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. COPELAND. Before the Senator leaves that point, is it not very easy to demonstrate, taking a given article, that as the tariff rate has increased from year to year the revenue of the Government from the actual importation has decreased, amplifying the point made by the Senator that it really is a bounty, because by the decline of the importation the local manufacturer has benefited to that extent, and at the same time the revenues of the Government have been depleted?

Mr. BORAH. The position of the Republican Party has always been that it was more important to build up industries and develop the country than it was to collect revenue, and that wherever it was necessary to build up an industry we would forego the revenue in order to build up the industry; and in that way work, as Mr. Hamilton says, in effect as a bounty. We are asking no more for the farmer.

Speaking of bounties, Mr. Hamilton says:

It can not escape notice that the duty upon the importation of an article can not otherwise aid the domestic production of it than by giving the latter greater advantages in the home market. It can have no influence upon the advantageous sale of the article produced in foreign markets—no tendency, therefore, to promote its exportation. * * * As often as a duty upon a foreign article makes an addition to its price it causes an extra expense to the community for the benefit of the domestic manufacturer. A bounty does no more. But it is the interest of the society in each case to submit to the temporary expense—which is more than compensated by an increase of industry and wealth, by an augmentation of resources and independence, and by the circumstance of eventual cheapness.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. EDGE. As a matter of fact has not the practical effect of the system been to accomplish both? It has not only protected industry at home but it has also gradually shown an increase in the actual tariff paid at the various ports of the country, has it not?

Mr. BORAH. No; that is not true, except as we take, perhaps, an entire tariff bill, the sum total; but on particular lines of industry and particular vocations we have constantly been willing to forego the collection of an amount of revenue which we could collect if we would put it upon a tariff-for-revenue basis, and have foregone millions and millions of dollars of revenue in order to build up industries in the United States.

Now, Mr. President, I am a believer in that principle. I do not wish to have it understood that I am attacking it. I am a believer in it. I think it far more important to build up an industry, to diversify our energies and our genius, to diversify our labor, to be a complete nation and a whole nation. I believe in the principle; but I plead with you to include, as Mr. Hamilton did, the agricultural interests of the United States as well as the industries. There is no more reason for refusing the farmer the advantage which he would have by a bounty, because, perchance, it foregoes the collection of revenue, than there is to refuse the Steel Trust its protection, and, at the same time that we do so, to forego the amount of revenue that we would have if we should put the matter upon a tariff-for-revenue basis.

Let me ask these gentlemen who sit about me and are members of the Finance Committee, are they willing to bring a bill into the Senate, when we shall take it up later, that will put the industries of this country upon a tariff-for-revenue basis, upon a basis where we can collect a very much greater amount of revenue, and then let the industries take care of themselves? If we take away the Government protection, the Government favor, they tell us that they will go into bankruptcy. Then, if we keep it there, we are giving them a bounty to keep them in business; are we not? Will you not do the same for the farmer?

Mr. Hamilton says:

Bounties are sometimes not only the best but the only proper expedient for uniting the encouragement of a new object of agriculture with that of a new object of manufacture.

Again, he says:

The true way to conciliate these two interests is to lay a duty on foreign manufactures of the material the growth of which is desired to be encouraged, and to apply the produce of that duty, by way of bounty, either upon the production of the material itself or upon its manufacture at home or upon both. In this disposition of the thing the manufacturer commences his enterprise under every advantage which is attainable as to quantity or price of the raw material, and the farmer, if the bounty be immediately to him, is enabled by it to enter into a successful competition with the foreign material.

Mr. Hamilton, as a part of his scheme for a protective tariff, realized that a protective tariff would elevate the cost of living; that it would increase the cost of production; and that those who had the advantage of it must share with those who did not have the advantage by giving them a bounty instead of a tariff.

Mr. Webster took the same position. When Webster first came into public life he was a free trader. He declared against protection because it was basically a bounty, a Government favor. In after years he came to be an advocate of protection, saying that the policy had been adopted, and New England would not stand out against it; but he never changed his view that the basic principle that a protective tariff is a bounty was true; and so it is, Mr. President. From the viewpoint of those who advocate a debenture, we are doing no more and asking no more than you will do to dozens and dozens of industries when you pass the next tariff bill.

The second proposition which these editorials stressed, as I read them, was the fact that they were opposed to any adequate duties upon farm products. Notice is, in fact, served upon the agricultural interests——

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. ALLEN. I just wanted to ask the Senator if he would read the list of 100 editorials to which he refers? My reason for asking the Senator to be specific is that I am a great reader of editorials myself. I am sure that I have read more than 200; and I find a singular unanimity of thought running through these editorials touching the matter that we are now discussing. The great editorial papers of the Middle West—I mean by that the molders of opinion—are almost unanimous in their belief that we are making a mistake in this body to endanger the chance of farm legislation by introducing the debenture.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, yes.

Mr. ALLEN. Many were genuinely surprised that it was introduced. From the Senator's own State I have a number of editorials, with which I do not agree, because I do not accuse the Senator of inconsistency; but these papers were singularly unanimous to the effect that the Democrats, joined by a number of the nonconformists, have managed, by this coalition of themselves, to defeat the possiblity of farm legislation in this special session, and that was the real merit of the debenture in the Democratic mind, and somewhat the merit of the debenture in some of the so-called Republican minds.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there is no doubt about the unanimity of sentiment in these editorials. To read them one would think they were all written by the same editor. The Senator is quite right. They were quite unanimous in their sentiment that it was a mistake to put the debenture in this bill. That is what I said; they were opposed to the debenture. They were also opposed, as I construe them, to any adequate duties upon farm products.

Mr. ALLEN. I did not draw the latter conclusion.

Mr. BORAH. I think the Senator, by the time he gets around to it, will have a different opinion about the matter when he comes to vote on the tariff bill.

Mr. ALLEN. Perhaps so.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho permit me to ask the Senator from Kansas a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield for that purpose?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas if he believes the statement of these editorial writers that it is the sole purpose of Democrats and those who are favoring the debenture to embarrass the President or to defeat farm relief?

Mr. ALLEN. I should say that when it comes to the degree of fullness of purpose which actuates them in that line, it is a question for scientific measurement rather than for public discussion.

Mr. CARAWAY. And the Senator is perfectly willing to trade any conviction in order to be with the President?

Mr. ALLEN. No; not so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho has the floor.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Kansas wants to raise here the question of integrity of mind upon this question, I am perfectly willing to enter the debate with him. I have no desire to engage in personalities; but if the Senator desires to question the integrity of purpose of those who voted for the debenture we will debate that for a while.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will permit me, the integrity which I sought to question for a moment was that of the members of my own profession who are writing the editorials. I thought the Senator from Idaho was doing an injustice to the editorial profession of this country in reading into the hundred editorials an expression which he desired to read, and which is not characteristic of the real intention and the real purpose and the real faith of the editorial writers of the country in general; that was all.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator inferred a few moments ago, as I understood, that the Democrats and a certain contingent upon this side seemed to have the desire of putting the debenture in this bill for the purpose of embarassing the situation politically. I want to say that so far as I am concerned that is a cowardly insinuation.

Mr. ALLEN. I was unfortunate in being misunderstood by the Senator. What I said was that I observed, in a great many of the more than 200 editorials I had read, that the unfortunate conclusion had been drawn that that was the spiritual condition in reference to the situation at this hour.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one comment?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I want to add to what the Senator from Idaho said that I consider the statement a cowardly insinuation.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. NORBECK. I just want to call the attention of the Senator from Kansas to the fact that it is a mistake to say that the Democrats were joined by certain others. It was the Republicans who proposed the debenture plan and not the Democrats; and, what is more, every Republican in the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry voted for it. They only withdrew their support when the letter came from the White House.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, in order to get the viewpoint of these editorials and sustain the position which I have taken that this is a real contest as to whether the farmer is going to share the protective system, let us go back a little and follow up the history of this idea.

I sat in this Chamber a few years ago and heard read from the desk a message from a Republican President proposing to put farm products upon the free list, in effect, and maintain the protective system for the industries of the United States. I witnessed the Republican Party, some of the members of which had been advocating protection in this country since the organization of the party, turn about and support a measure which had for its purpose and effect the placing of agriculture in the free market and the industries in the protected market, and that idea has never died out of the editorial pages of the eastern Republican press. We western people have had to meet it for 20 years.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. Was not the agricultural schedule as contained in the 1922 bill, the present tariff act, practically written by western agricultural Republicans—or at least those representing the agricultural section—and accepted by the Finance Committee and the Senate? Following that suggestion, although I have not made a careful analysis of the tariff bill now before the Senate Committee on Finance, it still further, to a very decided extent, increases the tariff upon practically all agricultural products.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator contend that the tariff bill just passed by the House would afford protection to American agriculture?

Mr. EDGE. I contend——

Mr. BORAH. When they have put on 1 cent of protection they have put on 3 cents of burden.

Mr. EDGE. As a matter of common sense, I contend that there is greater protection wherever rates have been raised, and I go back to my first statement—and I think I am entirely correct—the representatives of agricultural States, Members of the Senate in 1922, practically wrote the schedule for agriculture that appeared in that bill.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know anything about that; but if the representatives of agriculture wrote the bill which just passed the House, my conception of protection of American agriculture and theirs are widely different.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator was a member of the Senate in 1922 when the present act became a law.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I can answer the Senator from New Jersey to this extent. There were frequent meetings of the western Republican Senators in 1922, led by the former Senator from Idaho, Mr. Gooding. That little body of men secured what they wanted in a number of schedules, relating to agriculture, livestock, and mineral products. They were not able to obtain quite as much as they had hoped for, but they worked hard on these matters for several weeks.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it is not enough that they put duties upon the agricultural products; the important point is the protection which they give to agriculture compared with the protection which they give industries. That is the fault of this bill which has passed the House. If we take that bill and analyze it in the light of protection for the American farmer, we will find very little protection in the sum-total result.

I was talking about the question of reciprocity, however. Here is a statement made by Senator Root at that time, and, mind you, the same idea appears in these days:

> Mr. President, there is no one here who believes that there is the least possibility that the people of the United States, until another revolution of sentiment has come, will permit the cost of their living to be increased by the imposition of a duty upon ordinary foodstuffs.
> I have never thought that the duties which were imposed upon farm products were of any real general benefit to the farmer.

That was the idea which so long encouraged them to vote duties upon farm products. They thought, as we were exporters almost entirely at that time, that it did not really benefit the farmer, and did not change the situation, and therefore they voted that way, but the time came when the American farmer was fighting for the home market against the importations of foreign products, and when he asked to have a sufficient duty placed upon farm products to protect him in the home market, then they changed their viewpoint, and from that time on have either been opposing any duties at all or opposing duties of sufficient moment to protect the home market.

I read again from Senator Root:

> They have been quite indifferent, affecting only several localities here and there, so long as our production ran far ahead of our consumption. But with the increase of our cities as compared with our farming population, and the using up of our waste lands and the fencing in of old cattle ranges and the reduction of the productive power of our lands, we have about come to the point where the continuance of those duties, instead of being a matter of indifference to the people of the country, would result in putting up the cost of food.

In other words, we were told here upon this side of the Chamber that the time had come when the protective system would actually serve the American farmer, and therefore we were to open the markets of the world and permit the manufacturer to buy his food and his free raw materials in any market in the world where he could buy them the cheapest.

Now, you are mistaken, my friends, if you think that idea has not been promulgated in advance through the country in the last 15 or 20 days. They say, in effect, "We will not stand for a duty upon farm products. It will raise the cost of living. The cities will not submit to it. The Republican Party will have to pay the penalty if it agrees to that."

I repeat, as I said in the beginning, the real contest in this fight is whether the farmer is to be brought within the purview of the protective-tariff system. If he is denied a debenture, if he is denied adequate duties, then he is outside the system, its victim and not its beneficiary.

A paper published at that time in the State of Massachusetts, the home of the present Secretary of the Navy, said:

> Massachusetts comes far from feeding itself. In consequence of our extremely small percentage of agricultural workers and the excess of population in proportion to available farm land, the State is mainly dependent on outside sources for its food supplies. If, then, we are sure to buy from two-thirds to five-sixths of our food from producers at a distance; if by no possibility we can get whatever advantage might arise from relying on our own farmers to come anywhere near feeding us, no obligation prevents us from seeking to buy in the cheapest market available. The extension of Canadian reciprocity in the matter of manufacture is, in our belief, for the present out of the question. These will, at least, not be discouraged—

That is, the manufacturers—

> if we can make it possible for our people to buy their food in the cheapest market, if Canada chances to profit by supplying our needs to some small extent, so much the better for both Canada and for ourselves. But there is no reason why we should restrict our new purchases to Canada. If Mexico or Argentina or Australasia can help us out, let us turn to them as well—

And buy our food products in those countries.

A few days ago the Secretary of the Navy went to his home in Massachusetts and denounced the Republican Members of the Senate for voting for the debenture. Massachusetts would be in the hands of a receiver if it were not for the bounty which they receive from the high-protective tariff. I do not wish to withdraw the protection from them, except where they have more than a fair application of the principle would give. That which they have which is reasonable under the old sound principle I am willing for them to have. But the Secretary of the Navy and all his coadvisors must understand that the agricultural interests of the United States have reached the point where they need the protective system, where they need the benefit of the protective tariff, where they must have it applied as a debenture for those things of which they furnish a surplus, and need high duties upon those things in which we are in competition with the rest of the world.

What was the offense alleged against the recalcitrant Members of the Senate?—

> You can not call them Republicans because they are only responsible to certain forces within their own State, a fact that was shown in a recent agricultural bill when the insurgents joined forces with the Democrats.

It is true, Mr. President, that those of us who come from the agricultural States feel a sense of responsibility to the agricultural interests. Our sole offense is that of having voted to give the same protection to the agricultural interests which the Massachusetts Representatives on this side of the Chamber have heretofore voted to give to their industrial interests.

Mr. President, what, in conclusion, is it the farmer asks? First, he asks the full benefit of the home market. He asks for protective duties which will give him the home market. He is not willing, in order to get those protective duties, to have embargoes placed upon manufactured products. He insists that the time has come when he is in competition with cheap labor abroad, the same as is industry, and that he is entitled to protective duties which will protect him against the competition of such cheap labor.

As I said in the beginning, we are importing some $2,500,000,000 worth of stuff into this country which the American farmer can produce. He insists that that home market, according to the pledge in the platform, shall be given over to him to the full extent of his ability to supply it. Secondly, he asks, as an exporter, to be placed upon an equality with those who enjoy the bounty of a protective tariff. He asks for the doctrine of Hamilton.

In the third place, he asks for a proper marketing system, that he may reach the market without being robbed on the way.

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. SACKETT. May I ask the Senator whether he now advocates an embargo against the import of any agricultural commodity?

Mr. BORAH. Oh, no.

Mr. SACKETT. Does he go to that extent?

Mr. BORAH. No; but I would place the duties high enough to enable the American farmer to supply the home market exclusively to the full extent of his ability to do so.

Mr. SACKETT. Would the Senator also go to the extent of saying that there ought to be high enough duties on the products of industry to amount practically to an embargo?

Mr. BORAH. No; but some of them have practically an embargo.

Mr. SACKETT. If they need it, would the Senator go to that extent?

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not go to that extent.

Mr. SACKETT. The Senator would make a difference between agricultural industry in respect to that matter?

Mr. BORAH. No. What I said was that I would give the home market to the American farmer to the extent of his ability to supply it. I would make the duties that high. I would make the duty represent the difference between the cost of production abroad and the cost of production at home, and if that is done the American farmer will be able to supply and to hold the home market.

Mr. SACKETT. There are some branches of industry which also need protection from foreign importations. Would the Senator want to go to that extent with those particular branches of industry?

Mr. BORAH. To what branches does the Senator have reference?

Mr. SACKETT. I do not know that I can recall a particular branch now, but there are branches which are suffering from importations from abroad which have a capacity for overproduction at home.

Mr. BORAH. I would give industry the same protection; that is, the difference between the cost of production here and the cost abroad.

Mr. SACKETT. So that they would practically get an embargo on those products?

Mr. BORAH. Oh, no; I do not think it would amount to an embargo. The true basis of the protective tariff is a tariff which represents the difference between the cost of production at home and the cost abroad, and that is what I want to apply to the American farmer.

Mr. SACKETT. I just wanted to know whether the Senator would make any difference between industry and the farmer. I agree with the Senator that the farm industry ought to have the home market.

Mr. BORAH. I am perfectly willing—and I wish I could induce the industries to adopt the principle of giving industry a tariff which represents the difference between the cost of production at home and the cost of production abroad.

Mr. SACKETT. If we could find out what it was.

Mr. BORAH. Yes. I think if we could have a tariff based upon that principle it would be a just tariff; but I do not think the present tariff is based upon that principle. I voted against the present tariff law, and I voted against it, first, because I thought the duties upon industries were out of all proportion to the protection given the farmer. That was one reason. The other reason was because of the flexible tariff provision contained in the measure, which I think is unconstitutional, and if not unconstitutional, vicious in policy.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. Does the Senator from Idaho know any single industry in America that has not protection to the fullest extent as between the cost of production abroad and the cost at home?

Mr. BORAH. I do not.

Mr. GLASS. I doubt whether anybody else does. As a matter of fact, it has been computed that the excess of protection over the difference between the cost abroad and the cost here amounts to about $4,000,000,000.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Idaho will yield——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. Without attempting to pose as an expert, if the Senator from Virginia will look through the thousands of pages of testimony adduced by the Committee on Ways and Means at its hearings, both as to industry and agriculture, he will find, I know—because I have already looked over quite a bit of it—that many industries give statistics of what are alleged to be facts demonstrating that the tariff does not represent the actual difference between the cost of manufacture abroad and the cost at home.

Mr. GLASS. As I have had occasion to say elsewhere, it is altogether ex parte testimony and we have had seven weeks or more of it before the Senate committee. Nobody ever appeared for the consuming public. Only those people interested in special privilege appeared at the hearings.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. On that proposition we do know with accuracy that the value of the manufactured products in the United States has amounted to $60,000,000,000 since the agricultural depression, so it seems to me that to assume that only $4,000,000,000 of it is due to the tariff and the bounty we pay because of the tariff is low rather than high.

Mr. BORAH. I have no desire to change the principle as between the manufacturer and the farmer. I am perfectly willing to apply the same principle to both. What I am asking for and what we are asking for is the application of the principle to the farmer the same as to industry.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. GLENN. Does the Senator think it is desirable to extend the debenture plan to industry as well as to the farmer?

Mr. BORAH. If I could imagine a condition where it could apply to industry I should not object. I can not imagine any condition where it could apply to industry, but possibly it might do so.

Mr. GLENN. The particular matter I had in mind was the possibility of applying it, for instance, during a depression in the coal-mining business. I do not know whether it would be possible to apply it to that situation or not.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know about that.

Mr. President, here is the situation: We have two classes of producers in the United States, one engaged in producing commodities of which we produce a surplus, and another engaged in producing commodities where we produce in competition with the outside world. Those who represent the agricultural interests from the viewpoint of myself contend for two propositions; first, for the debenture because we believe that it is the only way by which immediate and effective relief can be given to the farmer. We feel, as Hamilton stated, that that is the only way we can compensate the farmer for the increased cost of the things which he has to buy by reason of the high protective tariff.

We are asked now to give up the debenture. If we give up the debenture we must necessarily place outside of the protective system the farmer who produces products of a surplus character. There is no way by which he can enjoy the protective system if he can not get the benefit from the debenture. He is outside of it. He is producing where he has to sell in the open market, in the world market. He is buying in a protected market. There is no possible way by which he can compensate himself unless it is, as Hamilton said, by us granting him a compensation in the way of a bounty. We are asked to give up the debenture.

Then, mark what I tell you, when the tariff bill comes before the Senate we will be asked to give up the duties which are sufficient to protect American agriculture as compared with the duties upon industrial items. I say that for the reason that when we analyze the House bill we find that is its effect. The farmer can receive no real benefit from the change in tariff duties as they are found in the House bill if the increases which he gets upon his duties, or the few that he does get, are far more than outweighed by increased duties upon the things which he has to buy. I repeat, therefore, that our contest here is whether the farmer is going to enjoy the protective system. We are contending for no new or untried principle; we are pleading for economic equality. We are asking for nothing in the way of favor; we are asking for simple economic justice. We want no temporary remedies; we want permanent equality in the great struggle for existence.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Frazier	La Follette	Simmons
George	McKellar	Smith

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the vote on the conference report is an exceedingly important one. It is my opinion that Members of this body should have, as nearly as we can arrange it, a definite date fixed for voting. Therefore I am going to propose the following unanimous-consent agreement and ask that it be read at the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed unanimous-consent agreement will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at 3 o'clock p. m. to-morrow the Senate proceed to vote upon the question of agreeing to the conference report on the pending farm relief bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] I understand expects to speak on the motion to adopt the conference report, but I think ample opportunity will be afforded for him to do so to-morrow after the Senate convenes. I am in hearty sympathy with the proposal of the Senator from Oregon. I concur in the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I suggest, if the agreement is entered into, that we meet at 11 o'clock so as to give everyone time who wishes to be heard.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not believe that will be necessary, if the Senator from Alabama will pardon me. I think that between 12 and 3 o'clock to-morrow ample opportunity will be afforded for all the discussion that is necessary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request submitted by the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I would like to have the unanimous-consent agreement read again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will again read the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

It was again read by the Chief Clerk.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Oregon to fix the hour at 4 o'clock instead of 3 o'clock, if he can conveniently do so.

Mr. McNARY. I have no objection to that change.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not object to the change the Senator from California requests.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to entering into the unanimous-consent agreement as now modified? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The agreement entered into was given the form of an order as follows:

Ordered, by unanimous consent, That at 4 o'clock p. m. to-morrow the Senate proceed to vote upon the question of agreeing to the conference report on the pending farm relief bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What is the further pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. WATSON obtained the floor.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I am not advised that any other Member of the Senate desires to discuss the conference report. If I am in error, I should be glad to be advised.

Mr. HARRISON. To-morrow some one will desire to discuss it.

Mr. McNARY. I meant to-day.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, the unfinished business, the national-origins question, is still before the Senate, and if no one wishes to discuss farm relief we might go ahead with the resolution of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE].

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allen	Gillett	McMaster	Smoot
Ashurst	Glass	McNary	Steck
Blease	Glenn	Metcalf	Steiwer
Borah	Goff	Moses	Swanson
Bratton	Goldsborough	Norbeck	Thomas, Idaho

Fess	Keyes	Sheppard	Wheeler

George	McKellar	Smith

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. McNARY obtained the floor.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. McNARY. I do not desire to yield for a moment. Mr. President, I am advised that no Member of the body desires further to discuss the conference report to-day, and I ask unanimous consent, therefore, that it may be laid aside temporarily.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

NATIONAL-ORIGINS CLAUSE OF IMMIGRATION ACT

Mr. NYE. I ask that the unfinished business may now be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 37) to discharge the Committee on Immigration from the further consideration of the bill (S. 151) to repeal the national-origins provisions of the immigration act of 1924.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a number of Senators are absent, believing that there would be no possibility of a vote on the unfinished business to-day or on the conference report upon the farm relief bill. I would not like to see the national-origins resolution taken up and voted on now. Although I do not know of any Senator who plans to speak at this moment. I think the general expectation was that we would discuss the conference report on the farm relief bill all day.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, there are some Senators on this side of the aisle who desire to vote on the national-origins resolution who are not present to-day. They will be here to-morrow.

Mr. NYE. Then, Mr. President, I should like to inquire if there is any possibility this afternoon of fixing a time for a vote upon the national-origins resolution?

Mr. HEFLIN. I myself would object to that, Mr. President.

RECESS

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, believing that the conference report on the farm relief bill would be discussed all day to-day, and after a conference with the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from Arkansas about it, understanding that a vote would probably be taken to-morrow by unanimous consent, I informed a number of Senators who came and asked me as to the situation that no vote of any kind would be taken to-day. Many Senators want to attend the laying of the corner stone of the new Department of Commerce Building, which is to take place at 4 o'clock this afternoon. With the understanding I have, I think the course for us to pursue is to take a recess; and I now move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, June 11, 1929, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, June 10, 1929

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God of love and Father of mercies, Thou alone canst multiply our strength and usefulness many, many times. We seek Thy guidance and help, that we may appreciate the unrecognized blessings of life. Beside every fountain of bitterness Thou dost unveil some star of hope, and in the hour when courage runs low Thou art nigh. Give us sustaining wills to trust Thee, love moral truths, and skill to interpret and enforce them. Bless us with the glow of happiness that comes from a sense of Thy approval. Thou art truth! Thou art infinite truth. O God, may we be followers of that truth that shall stand in the judgment morning and not be ashamed. Through Jesus Christ our Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the speech delivered over the radio Saturday evening on reapportionment by the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG].

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I wonder if the gentleman would object to my coupling with his request the request that the speech of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] may follow that in the RECORD?

Mr. WOODRUFF. I have not the slightest objection to that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BROWNING. Then I make that request, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to either request?

There was no objection.

REAPPORTIONMENT—SPEECH OF SENATOR ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a speech over the radio Saturday evening, June 8, 1929, by the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] upon the subject of reapportionment.

Senator VANDENBERG's speech in full follows:

The word "reapportionment" probably sounds academic and colorless and uninteresting to unfamiliar ears. But within it, when adequately understood, is embraced the prime vitality of the representative institutions of American government. The word describes the process through which each State gets its constitutional share of Representatives in Congress and of presidential electors. Such a process is the well spring from which flows the control of our constitutional democracy. Nothing could be more fundamentally important. Therefore honest reapportionment, pursuant to the Constitution's mandate and formula, concerns every prudent citizen who thinks straight enough to realize that the Constitution's preservation is prerequisite to the Republic's perpetuation.

CHARGES POLITICAL SELFISHNESS

From 1790 to 1910 there was a census every 10 years and a reapportionment based upon the resultant enumeration of the American people, as ordered by the first article in the Constitution. It was the clearly expressed purpose of the framers of the Constitution that the House of Representatives thus should accurately reflect the changing trends of our population. Those who now expediently quibble about the intentions of the fathers are answered convincingly by the unbroken record of 120 years—from Washington to Taft—during which no Congress ever permitted more than two years to intervene between each decennial census and its sequent reapportionment. For more than a century this basic function was scrupulously protected. There were no detours from the great main highway of constitutional good faith.

Then commenced an amazing interlude of entrenched political selfishness and of flagrant and contemptuous nullification. There has been no reapportionment since 1911. The census of 1920 never has been reflected in a reassignment of Representatives in Congress and, correspondingly, of presidential electors. The House twice initiated the necessary legislation—once in 1921 and again in the winter of 1928. But the Senate stolidly declined to face its constitutional obligation. It strangled the first House bill in a committee pigeonhole. It killed the second in the windstorm or a perverse Senate filibuster. As a result four Congresses and two Presidents since 1920 have been chosen on a distorted and anticonstitutional basis. According to 1930 census estimates, this decade of trespass and default now produces 23 misplaced seats in the House of Representatives, 23 misplaced votes in the presidential Electoral College, and 32,000,000 defaulted persons who are robbed of the spokesmanship which the Constitution promised and intends. This element of progressive fraud taints the entire legislative and administrative structure.

SEES UNITED STATES TRANQUILLITY THREATENED

Surely it can not be gainsaid—in the face of such alarming exhibits—that reapportionment is of paramount concern, not only to the integrity of the Constitution but also to a just sense of elementary American fair play and good sportsmanship. Nay, more: The perpetuation of such outrage might, in its lengthened shadow, threaten the tranquillity of the Nation. It is not to be wholly forgotten in this connection that the Republic was born in the travail of a war which responded to the significant shibboleth that "taxation without representation is tyranny." It always was tyranny. It always will be tyranny. It is tyranny to-day. Yet that precise tyranny has been recklessly inflicted upon great American constituencies ever since 1920.

The magnified imposition may be personified by a single comparison. There are to-day approximately as many people in one Michigan congressional district, having one Congressman, as there are in the whole State of Mississippi, with eight Congressmen. California likewise has one congressional district equally as large. Such contemplations outrage every tenet of constitutional justice. It must seem almost unbelievable to the casual observer that Congress should have declined to rectify such glaring discrepancies. Yet Congress has thus refused for eight sterile, contemptuous years, and large elements in Congress are continuing this very month to embrace every possible recourse which once more may checkmate reapportionment in 1930.

Ah, they do not meet the issue thus squarely. They profess great sympathy with these disfranchised constituencies and they join the lamentations over ugly nullification since 1920. But the only reapportionment law which they ever seem to favor is some law which is not pending before Congress. The pending proposal is always wrong. They keep the word of promise to the ear and break it to the hope.

Last December—if I may be pardoned a personal word—I announced on the floor of the Senate that since a census has but one constitutional purpose—namely, to provide a reapportionment base—I should do my utmost to prevent a 1930 census unless it could carry within itself the guaranty of a corresponding 1930 reapportionment. Thus the 1930 census law was held back, and thus census and reapportionment are linked together in the bill which now approaches a climax in the present extra session—a climax supported by the logical and patriotic recommendation of President Hoover that the issue is so emergent as to demand this extra-session verdict. At last Article I of the Constitution—first in import as well as in number—gets its belated day in court.

WOULD CURE REAPPORTIONMENT FAULTS

This pending bill aspires permanently to cure all reapportionment defaults in each decennium hereafter. It parallels and authenticates the Constitution for keeps. It provides that when the 1930 census, and each subsequent census, is completed, the President shall report the result to Congress. He shall also report a table showing how the existing sized House (now 435 Members) would be reapportioned by the method used at the last preceding apportionment. If Congress thereupon fails to pass its own reapportionment law, then the table reported by the President becomes automatically effective. Thus the country would be assured that the 1930 census will be validated in a constitutional apportionment. Thus, indeed, action would be guaranteed in every subsequent decade. Congressional inertia no longer could cheat this fundamental constitutional purpose. Such an obstructive, destructive privilege does not rightfully belong to Congress. Congress must be the servant—not the master—of the Constitution. Otherwise we live in an elective despotism and constitutional democracy is dead. Otherwise the ax is laid to the root of the tree of representative government.

Opposition to this bill has come chiefly from States which would lose Representatives if there were a reapportionment. Because I decline to question the motives of my able colleagues in the opposition, I prefer to look upon this as just a strange coincidence. Yet it might reflect a perfectly understandable human emotion. At any rate it would be easier to understand than have been some of the arguments and efforts marshaled in the hostile debate.

It has been urged, for example, that we propose an untoward delegation of power to the President. With entire respect for the good conscience of those who urge this view, yet I am bound to testify that we delegate nothing except a ministerial problem in arithmetic—a problem to which there can be but one answer. There is no actual delegation of any "power" whatsoever—within a rational meaning of that word.

PAYS TRIBUTE TO SENATORS

Again, it has been urged that we should not count aliens. Yet aliens have been counted in every previous reapportionment, and the Constitution requires their inclusion when it calls for a count of "the whole number of persons" in each State. The greatest constitutional lawyers in the Senate—such as Senator BORAH on the Republican side and Senator WALSH of Montana on the Democratic side—declare the inclusion of aliens to be mandatory. Yet all such considerations have been swept aside by those who once more would defeat this latest effort to force a just recognition of representative rights. No expedient has been ignored in the long-time effort to hamper and harass this undertaking.

In spite of bitter opposition, this bill passed the Senate on May 29. I pause to pay my tribute of particular respect to 14 Senators from States which may lose Representatives under the terms of this bill, and on the basis of the 1930 census, yet who, in the face of a constitutional duty, courageously recorded themselves in favor of this insurance policy upon the Constitution's life. I refer to Senators HALE and GOULD, of Maine; WALSH and GILLETT, of Massachusetts; COPELAND and WAGNER, of New York; WATSON and ROBINSON, of Indiana; CAPPER and ALLEN, of Kansas; REED, of Pennsylvania; SACKETT, of Kentucky; NORRIS, of Nebraska; and PATTERSON, of Missouri.

In all, 17 States seem destined to lose one or more Representatives in 1930, and 11 States seem destined to gain. It is unfortunate that there must be losses. But until the population is static apportionment can not be static—unless the Constitution succumb to paralysis. The real question is not the petty transfer of a few seats in Congress. The real question is whether Congress itself shall preserve constitutional integrity.

The House passed this bill in somewhat amended form on June 5.

The legislation now hangs in conference between the two Chambers. The prospect is for final action in both Chambers during the week to come. If this bill finally joins the statutes, the fateful jeopardy involved in the persistent failure of all reapportionment for eight years past will permanently end. The Constitution once more will mean what it says. Our representative democracy will rest more firmly upon sound foundations.

REAPPORTIONMENT—SPEECH OF REPRESENTATIVE JOHN E. RANKIN

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a speech over the radio Saturday evening, June 8, 1929, delivered by Hon. JOHN E. RANKIN of Mississippi, upon the subject of reapportionment in debate with Senator VANDENBERG, of Michigan.

The speech is as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, so much misinformation has been disseminated throughout the country relative to the so-called reapportionment bill which was recently railroaded through the House and is now in conference, that I have come to-night, in response to an invitation on the part of the Washington Star, to try to correct some of the erroneous impressions which this propaganda has made, and to refute some of the charges that have been leveled at those Members of the House of Representatives who have been trying to preserve one of the most sacred principles of our American institutions, that of maintaining an independent Legislature unhampered by Executive control.

The advocates of the census reapportionment bill recently passed by the House and the Senate have charged that those of us who opposed it were nullifying the Constitution of the United States. That charge is not true. We are in favor of reapportionment, but we first want an accurate census to base it on.

The proponents of this measure contend that it is mandatory under the Constitution that we reapportion after every census. I do not agree with them. But if their contention is correct, they are the violators of the Constitution themselves. For the bill which they propose does not attempt to reapportion Congress under the census of 1920, as their alleged constitutional mandate would require, but provides for a reapportionment under the census of 1930 and delegates the power to make the reapportionment to the President of the United States.

This concentration of power into the hands of the Chief Executive is one of the greatest steps toward the centralization of governmental powers into the hands of the President ever taken in this country, and surrenders one of the sacred principles of legislative government for which our forbears have fought for a thousand years. Those of us who do not believe that the Constitution requires that reapportionment be made after every census have declined to support reapportionment based on the 1920 census for the reason that it was inaccurate, and reapportionment under it would have greatly discriminated against the agricultural States.

That census was taken at a time when we were just emerging from the World War, when many of our boys were away in the service, and great numbers of our farming people were concentrated into the large congested centers and engaged in those industrial activities incident to the war. Besides, it was taken in the wintertime, when a vast number of our farming people were not to be found at home, when the roads were bad, when it was pouring down rain throughout the Southern States, and when many of the Northern and Western States were wrapped in a shroud of snow.

It was also taken at the peak of high prices, when it was found impossible to secure men to go out and count the country people for the small compensation paid.

As a result a great number of the agricultural States of the South and West—such as Kentucky, Kansas, Nebraska, Indiana, Iowa, Mississippi, and Missouri—would have had part of their representation taken away from them and transferred to the large congested centers of the East, with large alien populations, if reapportionment had been made under that census.

When this bill finally came before the House last week and an attempt was made to eliminate aliens from the count, or even to take a census of the aliens who are in the United States unlawfully, it met with the most strenuous resistance on the part of Representatives from those localities where these aliens are largely to be found.

The Tinkham amendment to cut down southern representation under the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments was merely a vindictive thrust at the South for its stand on immigration and would have had no practical effect even if left in the bill. It was adopted by a combination of eastern Republicans and Tammany Democrats.

It must have been humiliating to President Hoover, and it ought to have been humiliating to him, after the treatment which he received last year south of the Potomac River, to see the leaders of his party taking this insulting jibe at the South, aided and abetted by the representatives of Tammany, whose candidate last year received the only appreciable majorities given him in the Southern States.

Southern Representatives and southern Senators took their political lives in their hands to support the offspring of Tammany in 1928, and in doing so many of our best men in both the House and the Senate went down to their political graves in the greatest landslide this country has seen for more than a hundred years.

The pettiness of this fling at the South renders it the more inexcusable. Congress has no right to interfere with the representation of the Southern States on account of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments. The Supreme Court of the United States in the Civil Rights case in 1883, at page 3 (109 U. S.), says:

"Until some State law has been passed or some State action through its officers or agents has been taken adverse to the rights of citizens sought to be protected by the fourteenth amendment, no legislation of the United States under said amendment nor any proceeding under such legislation can be called into activity, for the prohibitions of the amendment are against State laws and acts done under State authority."

In other words, until the State passes a law violating the fourteenth amendment, its penalties can not be invoked. Senator BORAH, of Idaho, said in a speech in the Senate a year or two ago that he had recently examined the laws and constitutions of all the Southern States and had failed to find where a single one of them violated either the fourteenth amendment or the fifteenth amendment.

But even if it should violate the fourteenth amendment, Congress would not be called upon to act, for the Supreme Court would hold it null and void under the fifteenth amendment, which provides that no such law shall be passed.

The Hon. James G. Blaine, the Republican leader for years and who was Speaker of the House of Representatives at the time the fifteenth amendment was adopted, in his Twenty Years of Congress says:

"Its prime object was to correct the wrongs which might be enacted in the South, and the correction proposed was direct and unmistakable, viz, that the Nation would exclude the negro from the basis of apportionment wherever the State should exclude him from the right of suffrage.

"When, therefore, the Nation by subsequent change in its Constitution declared that the State shall not exclude the negro from the right of suffrage, it neutralized and surrendered the contingent right before held to exclude him from the basis of apportionment. Congress is thus plainly deprived by the fifteenth amendment of certain powers over the provisions of the fourteenth amendment. Before the adoption of the fifteenth amendment, if a State should exclude the negro from suffrage, the next step would be for Congress to exclude the negro from the basis of apportionment. After the adoption of the fifteenth amendment, if a State should exclude the negro from suffrage, the next step would be for the Supreme Court to declare that the act was unconstitutional, and therefore null and void."

Thus it will be plainly seen that Congress has no right to interfere with the representation of the Southern States on account of alleged violations of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution.

This thrust was simply made to gratify the vindictiveness of certain politicians toward the South, because, forsooth, her Representatives joined with those from other sections of the country in an attempt to save America for Americans.

The fight began over an amendment providing for taking the census of the aliens who are in the United States unlawfully. The main controversy arose over the motion to exclude aliens from the count in the reapportionment of representation in the House. It was contended by those opposing the motion that the word "persons" in the Constitution included aliens, and that Congress was powerless to exclude them from the count in making the reapportionment. But our contention was that since it is a Constitution adopted by and for the people of the United States the word "persons" referred to American persons and that Congress had the power to exclude aliens from the count in making its reapportionment.

There are more than 5,600,000 aliens in the United States who have never taken out their first papers. Under the present apportionment they are allotted about 20 or 25 Congressmen, which under a new apportionment would have to be taken away from the agricultural States with their old-line American stocks. Surely the framers of the Constitution did not contemplate such a situation or intend that the Constitution should be so construed.

It is estimated that there are more than 3,000,000 aliens in this country now unlawfully. They are also counted and given between 12 and 15 Representatives in the American Congress, which are in turn taken away from the agricultural States of the South and Middle West and rural New England. Could the framers of the Constitution, by the wildest stretch of imagination, have contemplated that Representatives would be taken away from States composed exclusively, or almost exclusively, of American citizens, and given to these alien interlopers who are in our country without our consent, against our will, and subject to be deported at any time they are caught?

They come from the riff-raff of the Old World. From them are recruited the gunmen and the gangsters. They not only come in violation of our laws but bring with them a contempt for American institutions. Yet the alien influence is so strong in this Capitol that we are not only prevented from excluding them from the count in apportioning Representatives but we are not able to secure the passage of a law forcing them to register in order that we may deport them or drive them out of the country.

Listen to this: It was stated at Geneva the other day that between 60,000 and 75,000 undesirable aliens are bootlegged into the United States annually as seamen; that many come in from the ports of Bremen, Amsterdam, and Antwerp alone. And I understand the reports of the Secretary of Labor show that many of them are brought in on American vessels. Think of that! American vessels even bootlegging into this country a class of undesirables that will be a burden upon this country, which burden will be passed on down to your children and your children's children for generations yet to come.

Yet this administration not only refuses to exclude those undesirable, unwelcome aliens from the count but proposes to give them representation in Congress by taking it away from the old, settled agricultural States with the largest percentages of old-line American inhabitants.

But the battle is not over. This question is now an issue, and will be until it is settled, in practically every congressional district in the United States. The American people are determined to know who is going to run this country. This is a movement to save America for Americans. It was contended on the floor of the House that the Supreme Court would hold this amendment unconstitutional, which, to me, seemed absurd.

I realize that the Supreme Court of the United States has gone a long way at times in construing various portions of the Constitution, but it will never go so far as to say that it is our duty to give aliens representation in the American Congress or to give representation in that august body or in the Electoral College to men who have come to our shores in violation of law and who have no right to remain on American soil.

FARM RELIEF AND THE TARIFF

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of agriculture and the tariff.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of agriculture and the tariff. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, in obedience to the call of the President of the United States, the Congressmen of the various States have assembled in Washington for the specific purpose of enacting agricultural or farm relief and to enact a tariff bill. This step has been taken to carry out the policies and promises that were advocated in the last election. Of the 37,000,000 people who voted on November 6, 1928, 21,000,000 voiced their approval of the policies of Herbert Hoover.

In the first place, I want to compliment the Committee on Agriculture for the able and valuable services they have rendered in securing expert information from farmers, stockmen, farm organizations, cooperative associations, and every agency that would throw any light on farm problems, not only in the United States but throughout the world.

Mr. HAUGEN, the chairman, is to be highly commended for what he did in framing this farm bill. As we all know, it is very difficult to find a remedy for all the ills that have come to the farmers in the last few years. I wish to say, however, that the bill as written will be of great value to the agricultural districts of the United States, and will go a long way in stabilizing the prices of farm products, thereby stimulating the farming industry.

It has been the attempt of this Congress to restore agriculture to a degree of prosperity on a basis with that of other industries.

The $500,000,000 made available by the Congress to be administrated by the Federal farm board will evidently put the wheels of agricultural industry in motion. This money is to be loaned to cooperative marketing associations of the various industries. This $500,000,000 is a nominal sum when one thinks of the production from agricultural and other resources amounting to more than $90,000,000,000 each year in the United States.

In my judgment the coming slogan will be: "From the city back to the farm." Young men who battled against the adversities of the farm and finally sought a more prosperous industry or occupation are now given a new hope and may return to the soil feeling that the results of their labor will equal that of any other industry. I am, therefore, predicting an era of prosperity.

The farm bill, like every other new law that has been enacted, is an experiment; and while it may not be in every particular as I would have written it, it will serve its purpose in aiding the farmer, I firmly believe.

The domestic products protected against foreign importation under the new tariff bill H. R. 2667, which, in my judgment, will prove to be one of the greatest tariff bills that has ever been enacted, will add new markets. I am reliably informed that during the year 1928 foreign agricultural products were imported into this country over the walls of our present protective laws to such an extent that it would require more than 14,000,000 acres of American land to grow them, which deprived thousands of American workmen of employment. What would become of the American laborer and American products if they were not protected?

At this time I want to congratulate the Ways and Means Committee, and Mr. HAWLEY, the author of the bill, for the splendid and systematic work they performed. I am informed that they had before their committee more than 1,100 witnesses, all representing the various industries of the United States. The hearings alone extended for some 45 days. The committee labored continuously for more than five months gathering information upon the administrative questions, customs practices, the past history of goods and commodities entering foreign trade as exports and imports, where and how produced, import values, sales prices, costs, labor, distribution, and the possibilities of increased production in the United States and foreign countries.

Every American citizen is directly interested in protective tariff. The free trader tells us that the consumer pays the tariff. That, as you know, is not true, for the reason that every man in the United States can manufacture and sell all kinds of articles and goods and the tariff in no way affects him. Who pays the tariff? The foreigner who imports his products through our ports into the United States. He must compete with American products and American labor by paying a tariff that will as nearly as possible make his cost equal to the cost of our production and labor.

In this tariff bill has been placed an adequate protection upon all articles produced in the United States. My district is about half and half agricultural and industrial, with an extensive dairy, poultry, and fruit production. The new tariff bill provides adequate protection upon these articles, as well as upon the articles vital to all other sections of the United States. I might here give a few of the new tariff rates:

Wool	pound	$0.34
Butter	do	.14
Milk	gallon	.05
Cream	do	.48
Eggs	dozen	.10
Tomatoes	pound	.03
Lambs	head	3.00
Veal	pound	.06
Lard	do	.03
Corn	bushel	.25
Hides	per cent	10
Leather	do	12½

This tariff serves to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and, above everything else, to protect American labor.

THE EXCLUSION OF ALIENS IN THE CENSUS

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BECK. It was a matter of great regret to me that I was not present during the debate and at the time the vote was taken upon the question of census and apportionment.

I had accepted an invitation some months ago to address the members of the Georgia bar, and that must explain my absence. I regret this doubly because it denied me the opportunity of making a reply to the argument that was made on May 1 last by the gentleman from the tenth district of Virginia, Mr. HENRY ST. GEORGE TUCKER, who contended that under the Constitution aliens were excluded from the decennial enumeration and were not "persons" within the meaning of Article I, section 2, of the Constitution.

I have a great respect for Mr. TUCKER's attainments as a constitutional lawyer, and when he favors the House with an expression of his views upon any question of constitutional law he is not only entitled to the careful hearing he had, but if his conclusions seem to any of us erroneous, it seems to me that his very distinction as a constitutional lawyer requires that any reply that can be made should be made. So I have prepared a reply to show the contrary contention, namely, that the Constitution did intend to include aliens within the word "persons," and for that purpose I have gone into the history of the pertinent provision in the Constitution and traced it back to the Articles of Confederation. It seems to me that if the history of the clause, in its gradual evolution from the Articles of Confederation until its final adoption by the Constitutional Convention, is taken into consideration, the conclusion is irresistible, on the historical argument alone, that the Constitution did intend to include under the name "persons" all human beings, with the exception of Indians not taxed and negro slaves to the extent of the proportion which the Constitution provides.

As I have given some time and thought to the matter, I shall ask unanimous consent of the House to revise and extend my remarks, so that any Member of the House who may care to hear the other side of the controversy from that presented by the distinguished gentleman from Virginia may have that opportunity.

I ask the privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RANKIN. Reserving the right to object, and, of course, I shall not object, since the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] presented one of the ablest arguments ever heard in this House some time ago against the tendency toward abdicating legislative power into the hands of the President, emphasizing that one of the great principles of representative government for which our forebears have fought for a thousand years is that of maintaining an independent Legislature, free from Executive control, I wonder if the gentleman from Pennsylvania in his extension of remarks would also discuss the advisability of our abdication in this bill and placing in the hands of the President of the United States the right to reapportion Congress, which belongs to the Congress itself, and the danger of continuing the delegation of legislative power to the Chief Executive. I wonder if the gentleman would do this.

Mr. BECK. I will give the suggestion of the gentleman from Mississippi my most careful and conscientious consideration. [Laughter.]

If the House will pardon me, I will answer the gentleman with a story. Disraeli was once asked by a member of the House of Commons if Russia took a certain course, naming it, what action Her Majesty's Government would take. The question was clearly one that should not have been asked. I do not mean that the question of the gentleman from Mississippi should not have been asked. To the great surprise of everyone Disraeli rose and said:

> In my judgment the question of the honorable member is one, in view of the delicate relations between Russia and England, that he should not have asked, but, as he has asked, I propose to give it frank answer, and so answering I say, if Russia takes this course Her Majesty's Government will give it its most careful consideration.

[Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, I listened to the address of the distinguished gentleman from Virginia with pleasure, as I always do when he addresses the House, and if he failed to convince me of the soundness of his contention, it was not due to any lack of respect on my part for his ability as a student of the Constitution or because he failed to say anything that could be said in support of his contention. The gentleman from Virginia holds a high and very deserved place in this House as an interpreter of the Constitution. He has brought to the great subject the researches of a lifetime and his auditors have the added satisfaction that any view that he expresses is not actuated by any ulterior or partisan motive but is dictated by his lifelong loyalty to the Constitution.

If I understood his argument correctly, he was, as he says, "driven to the conclusion" that the framers of the Constitution did not intend, when they used the word "persons," in Article I, section 2, of the Constitution, to include aliens. The title of his address, as given in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, might suggest a narrower contention that the framers of the Constitution did not intend either to include or exclude aliens but left it to the discretion of the Congress in making the enumeration.

While this latter contention could, in my judgment, be more plausibly supported, yet I doubt whether the gentleman from Virginia intended to suggest it, for he had been a zealous student of Madison's Debates, and they have doubtless satisfied him, as they must any careful reader, that, whatever else they intended, the framers of the Constitution did not intend to leave the time and the method of enumeration to the discretion of Congress. It was first suggested in the convention of 1787 that it should be left to Congress, but the wise men of the convention speedily saw that this would admit of the same legislative jugglery as the States practice when they so gerrymander districts as to give to one party a wholly disproportionate representation. They rejected the idea of leaving the precise method of the enumeration to the discretion of Congress and required that it be made in a specific way every 10 years.

Notwithstanding the title of his address, I think the gentleman from Virginia will agree with me that the framers of the Constitution intended to either include or exclude aliens from the enumeration, and the only question that seems to admit of discussion is the nature of their decision.

The gentleman from Virginia tells us that he is "driven to the conclusion" that they did not intend to include aliens. I am driven to the conclusion that they did, and I should not regard the question at this late day in the history of the Republic as even debatable, were it not that the gentleman from Virginia has given to his contention which he confesses is "novel," the great authority of his name. Indeed, the fact that it is a novel contention, 140 years after the Constitution became operative, in itself refutes his contention. Undoubtedly, questions may arise in the interpretation of the Constitution, even at this late day, which are novel, although the occasions must necessarily be few. I remember, as Solicitor General, arguing one question as to whether the clause of the Constitution, which prohibits any preference to any port, included the ports of a Territory. This question had never been raised and, in the nature of the case, it could not well be raised until there were Territories that had ports of entry and until Congress sought to discriminate against them.

When, however, a "novel" question has reference to a matter which has arisen every 10 years in the practical workings of the Government and it is clear that, during a period of over 140 years, a uniform construction has been adopted, then it can be fairly said that that construction of the Constitution has been definitely determined by usage and can not at this late day be reasonably questioned. Our Constitution was in its creation an evolution and it has remained an evolution ever since. Its development is due to formal amendment; to usage, which we call practical construction, and to formal judicial interpretation. Of amendments there are few; of judicial decisions there are many, but, far exceeding in importance either amendments or judicial decisions, the practical interpretation of the Constitution by those who conduct the machinery of the Government has always had the most persuasive force.

May I refer to a case which I had the privilege of arguing in the Supreme Court. It was unquestionably one of the greatest cases of this generation in determining the form of our Government. It was the so-called removal-from-office case, in which the question was again raised whether the President had the power to remove any official whom he had appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. It was true that the Constitution nowhere vested in express language any power to remove in the President, and it was equally true that very eminent men, at different periods of our country's history, had from time to time suggested a doubt as to whether the power of the President was drawn from his appointing power, which he shared with the Senate, or from his general executive power to see that the laws were faithfully executed. The case was finally decided in the great decision of Chief Justice Taft in Myers v. United States (272 U. S.), and it is significant that the Chief Justice rested his decision in large part upon the fact that, in the First Congress of the United States, in which were many men who had sat in the Constitutional Convention, a decision was then reached after prolonged debate that the President's power to remove was a part of the executive power vested in him by the Constitution and that Congress could not either impair or destroy it.

Similarly, in this case it can not be questioned that, in every previous enumeration, in apportioning Members of the House of Representatives aliens have been included in the basis of representation, and if the gentleman from Virginia is correct, then this Nation from the beginning has never been properly organized and there has been no true basis of representation. All of us will shrink from such a conclusion.

It is significant in this connection that another distinguished Member of this House—I refer to the gentleman from the fourth district of Kansas—while himself desiring to exclude aliens from the enumeration, has been unable to concur in the conclusion of Mr. TUCKER that the Constitution already works such exclusion. On February 13 last, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOCH] made a very able argument in support of a proposed constitutional amendment which would work such exclusion, and his argument clearly accepted as an unassailable fact that the Constitution in its present form requires the inclusion of aliens. His views are the more important because he had reached the conclusion that the time had come to exclude aliens from the enumeration, and it is fair to assume that if he could have construed the Constitution differently he would have done so.

Before passing to a closer discussion of the question, I want to notice two false premises upon which, it seems to me, the argument to which I am replying was based.

The first is that there were no aliens in the United States when the Constitution was adopted and that the question, therefore, had no serious consideration. Three or four times in the course of his address our colleague from Virginia reiterated this statement. Indeed, in his peroration, he said, "Why put in aliens when they were not here? There were not any aliens here; I mean practically none, of course."

The second premise of his argument was the statement that to include aliens was to give them an undue influence in the Government and that it was essential that they should be excluded to prevent such undue influence. Our friend from Virginia linked the presence of aliens in this country to "a splinter in the hand, a cinder in the eye; indeed, any foreign substance in the human body is liable to create irritation, friction, distress, and swelling, and so forth." He continued that any other interpretation would "admit aliens to a large influence in the Government of the United States," and as an illustration of his theory he stated that if two districts had each 500,000 people and one of them consisted wholly of American citizens and the other was equally divided between citizens and aliens, that the latter "would have double power over the other district."

I challenge the soundness of both premises. They seem to me without justification in fact.

Taking his first premise, long before the Constitution was adopted, there had already set in a great tide of immigration to this country. Especially in the Middle States there were many aliens. When the Constitution was adopted aliens were very welcome in this country. It was then recognized that its future greatness would depend to some extent upon migration to this country. The American people were then not as sensitive about aliens as they are now, for they all recognized that all of them were the descendants of men who were once aliens. One of the counts against George III in the Declaration of Independence was this:

> He has endeavored to prevent the population of these States; for that purpose obstructing the laws for naturalization of foreigners and refusing to pass others to encourage their migration hither.

In many of the Colonies there were the most liberal provisions with respect to aliens. Thus in Massachusetts no length of residence was required and in others only an oath of allegiance, while in others any permanent residence qualified a man to vote if he was a freeholder.

Pennsylvania especially had a heterogeneous population. Its chief city was then the true cosmopolitan city of the country. Recognizing the existence of many aliens in America, the naturalization laws of Pennsylvania were so liberal that any alien who had resided in Pennsylvania for one year and owned real estate was made ipso facto a citizen and accorded all the rights of such. The Constitution itself recognizes the necessity of naturalization in more than one passage.

Thus the framers of the Constitution could not have been ignorant of the fact that there were then many aliens in the United States and that many more were to come, and it is a plausible conjecture that, because they were truly a part of the population, subject to the laws of the country, they used the word "persons" in describing whom should be enumerated.

Equally without foundation is the second premise that to include aliens in the population is to give them an undue influence in the councils of the Nation, for that ignores the basic theory of representative government. Aliens are human beings, and as such have rights in any country in which they are domiciled, not only under the principles of natural justice but also by the provisions of the Constitution itself. Aliens help to create the wealth of our Nation; they are subject to its laws and must comply with all its demands of taxation.

The gentleman from Virginia suggested that if all the people of the United States could be called in a town meeting to determine upon questions of common interest aliens would naturally be denied a right to vote. That may be true, but, nevertheless, those who did vote would necessarily act for the common benefit of all the inhabitants, who would be obliged to respect the laws thus enacted. As such a town meeting is impossible, we have adopted the principle of representative government, and while only citizens can vote for such representatives such fact is not inconsistent with both the moral and political obligation of the representatives to act in the common interests of all, as all, whether citizens or not, are affected by such laws and are obliged to obey them. Aliens, therefore, who have become part of our household and who have cast their lots permanently with ours, and who presumably have a wish to become citizens when permitted to do so, have a just right to be represented, although they can not select the representatives, and the framers of the Constitution recognized this when they included them in the enumeration.

The only exception to this fundamental rule of public justice was the nontaxed Indians and the slaves. The former were regarded as sui generis and the right of the latter to be represented, even though they were regarded as property, was recognized by the Constitution by enumerating them to the extent of three-fifths of their number. Why include slaves and exclude alien freemen?

Not only was the argument of my friend from Virginia defective in its fundamental premises, but his method of construing the Constitution was, it seems to me, too narrow. His is the textual method of taking the words of the instrument and trying to determine the true meaning from the words themselves. The Constitution can never be adequately construed by this method and my friend's argument demonstrates the fact, for he himself shows that the word "persons" has been used in the Constitution in 27 different places and that it does not always have the same meaning in any one place. This is probably true. It certainly illustrates the fact that to determine what the framers meant by the word "persons" in Article I, section 2, you must consider not only the text of the Constitution, but also the debates in the Federal Convention and the historic background of that great document. It is therefore a singular fact that my friend from Virginia makes no reference to the debates in the Constitutional Convention and none whatever to the historic controversy between the great and the little States as to the basis of representation, and yet it can not be denied that Article I, section 2, was the final outcome of a controversy which began in the First Continental Congress and which became the greatest source of controversy in the Federal Convention itself.

When that controversy is recalled it seems clear and would be indisputable, but for Mr. TUCKER'S argument, that the word "persons" did include all human beings except those who were specifically excluded from Article I, section 2, and it will not be disputed that there is no express exclusion of aliens from the "persons" to be enumerated.

Words are always an imperfect medium of thought. As Justice Holmes once said, they are but the "skin of a thought." Nearly all the great controversies of history have turned upon the meaning of words, because no words can ever be used that fully express the meaning of those who employ them. Indeed, the meaning of words may often depend upon the inflection of the voice. The sardonic Disraeli was wont to reply to those who sent him the gift of a book, "I shall lose no time in reading your book," and to others he would reply, "I am lying under a sense of obligation to you for the gift of your book." Here the same words are susceptible of two precisely opposite meanings.

For this reason, the textual method of weighing the meaning of a general expression, like "persons," while it must be the first step in any discussion of meaning, is only the first step. To ascertain the true meaning, it is obligatory that we put ourselves in the mental attitude of those who used the words, and to do so we must understand the subject matter of their discussion and the purpose of the debate.

I therefore shall invite your attention in a brief reference to the genesis of Article I, section 2, and I think you will then see that, with the exception of negro slaves and of nontaxed Indians, it was the clear intention to enumerate the entire population, without respect to whether a given person was a full-fledged citizen or only, as an alien, a potential citizen.

Article I, section 2, was the culmination of a long-standing controversy between the Colonies, each of which had become by the act of revolution an independent and fully sovereign nation. The First Continental Congress constituted a provisional government of the most informal character. It was little more than a conference of newly created independent States for the purposes of common defense. It was the "United States" in embryo. It exercised many of the rights of a sovereign power and, among others, issued currency to pay the expenses of the new Government. The obligation to redeem such currency was distributed among the thirteen Colonies by apportioning to each a quota, for which each was individually responsible. Thereafter the expenses of the Government were largely met by requisitions, addressed to each State, but each State reserved the right to honor or dishonor the requisition as it seemed proper.

As to the method of estimating the quota, the Continental Congress had first suggested that it be based upon real-estate holdings, and for this purpose the Congress of 1783 had required the States to make returns of their lands, buildings, and inhabitants. Anticipating that this would not result satisfactorily, they recommended to the constituent States that the quota be based upon the number of inhabitants. (Journals of Congress, VIII, p. 129.) The difficulty of either method was due to the fact that, in the first place, there was no satisfactory method of estimating the value of taxable real estate, and, on the other hand, there was no authoritative census of the inhabitants.

The result might easily be anticipated. At first some States honored the requisition, and others disregarded it or were tardy in their payment; and as the financial affairs of the inchoate Government went from bad to worse, finally none of the States fully met the requisitions of the Government. This led to very great dissatisfaction, for each State had an equal voice in the new Government, and the injustice of allowing a State which contributed little or nothing to the national expenses or to the recruiting of the armies the same voice as a State which measurably met its share of the common burden soon became the source of great discontent.

Shortly after the Declaration of Independence attempts were made to put the form of the Government into more definite shape, and as a result the so-called Articles of Confederation were proposed in 1777 and tardily adopted in 1781. Under these articles each State was represented in Congress by not less than two nor more than seven Members, but each State was entitled to only one vote. Article VIII provided:

> All charges of war and all other expenses that shall be incurred for the common defense or general welfare, and allowed by the United States in Congress assembled, shall be defrayed out of a common Treasury, which shall be supplied by the several States in proportion to the value of all land within each State, granted to or surveyed for any person, as such land and the buildings and improvements thereon shall be estimated according to such mode as the United States in Congress assembled shall from time to time direct and appoint.

This was the first attempt to have an equitable apportionment of expenses, although the relative power of each State in the new Government remained the same, and the cause of the grievance was thereby in no respect removed.

I need not detail the terrible breakdown of the new Government under the Articles of Confederation. Congress attempted to apportion the expenses of government upon the value of the lands in each State, but, as to the costs of the Army and Navy, it was agreed by Article IX that Congress had power—> to make requisitions from each State for its quota in proportion to the number of white inhabitants in each State.

In this lay the germ of Article I, section 2, of the Constitution. The "white inhabitants," which excluded the Indians and the negroes, were taken as the basis of the quotas, because it was found impracticable to value the taxable real estate and it was believed that the number of white inhabitants would be a fair measure of the relative wealth of the various States.

This method of apportionment proved a complete failure, not because it was not sound in theory but because the conditions of poverty and the general demoralization that followed the treaty of peace made it impossible to carry out any such plan. For example, the Government made a requisition upon the States to raise $8,000,000, and only $400,000 was actually contributed. The receipts of the confederation in the last 14 months of its existence were less than $400,000. It was the so-called "critical period" of our history, and the new Nation nearly died at its birth.

The result of this financial chaos and the conflicting commercial regulations was the calling of the great Federal convention of 1787. The great problem that confronted that convention was due to the facts that I have recited. It confronted far more than the raising of revenue. It involved a question of political justice. Long before the convention met there were two opposite schools of thought in conflict. The one prevailed in the smaller States and the other in the larger. The small States were morbidly conscious of their new dignity as a nation and insisted upon absolute equality between the States that formed the Union. The larger States had a deep sense of the injustice of allowing each of the thirteen Colonies an equal voice when they differed so greatly in wealth and population and contributed so disproportionately to the common fund.

The sense of this injustice was manifested in the First Continental Congress and, as the war progressed and contributions of money and men by the different States varied not merely proportionately but in varying degrees of loyalty to the common cause, the unfairness of allowing a State, which contributed few men and less money the same vote as a State which taxed its resources of treasure and men to the utmost became more glaring. Therefore the great problem of the Federal Convention of 1787 was to reach an adjustment that would satisfy the pride of the little States, as sovereign nations, and the just demands of the larger States that political power should be proportioned to political burdens. Virginia and Pennsylvania were the two largest States, and before the convention met their delegates had met in caucus and formulated what was subsequently called the "Virginia plan." The second section of that plan provided:

> Resolved, therefore, That the rights of suffrage in the National Legislature ought to be apportioned to the quotas of contributions or to the number of free inhabitants, as the one or the other rule may seem best in different cases.

This plan, which was our Constitution in embryo, was bitterly assailed in an angry debate of many weeks by the delegates from the little States, which, in turn, submitted the so-called "New Jersey plan," but even that plan made the following provision in section 3:

> Resolved, That whenever requisitions shall be necessary, instead of the rule for making requisitions mentioned in the Articles of Confederation, the United States in Congress be authorized to make such requisitions in proportion to the whole number of white and other free inhabitants of every age, sex, and condition, including those bound to servitude for a term of years, and three-fifths of all other persons not comprehended in the foregoing description, except Indians not paying taxes.

It will thus be noted that in the Articles of Confederation and in both the Virginia plan and the New Jersey plan the apportionment was to be based upon the population in language so general as not to exclude aliens. It was a numbering of the people without respect to whether they were citizens or aliens and only the New Jersey plan made the exception of Indians not paying taxes and of three-fifths of the slaves. The Indians were excluded because they were regarded as nomadic, wild tribes, and in no true sense a part of the population, and the real dispute was as to the slaves, which the Northern States claimed could not be regarded as inhabitants, because they were regarded by their owners as property, while the slave-holding States insisted upon their being included in the enumeration. The three-fifths rule, as proposed in the New Jersey plan, which was put forth by the smaller States, was in the nature of a compromise.

I need hardly remind the House of the great discussion, lasting many weeks, with which the convention began and which related wholly to the question whether the States should be represented in both Houses of Congress on an equality or in proportion to their wealth or numbers. It resulted in a grave crisis, which nearly disrupted the convention, but the first and great compromise of the convention was finally reached through the influence of Doctor Franklin, whereby the principle of equality of right was recognized in the Senate and the equity of proportional representation was to be recognized in the constitution of the lower branch of Congress.

After this compromise had been adopted the debate then began as to the basis of representation in this House, and the only question was as to the method of allotment.

When the debate had been concluded the convention, sitting as a Committee of the Whole, on the 13th day of June made their report, and section 7 provided that—

> The rights of suffrage in the first branch of the National Legislature (the House of Representatives) ought not to be according to the rule established in the Articles of Confederation but according to some equitable ratio of representation, namely, in proportion to the whole number of white and other free citizens and inhabitants of every age, sex, and condition, including those bound to servitude for a term of years and three-fifths of all other persons not comprehended in the foregoing description, except Indians not paying taxes in each State.

It will hardly be questioned that aliens were included in the comprehensive expression, "white and other free citizens and inhabitants of every age, sex, and condition."

Unable to agree upon equality in the Senate, the report of the Committee of the Whole was referred to a compromise committee, and that committee reported in favor of equality in the Senate and proportionate representation in the House and recommended that property, as well as persons, ought to be taken into account in order to obtain a just index of the relative rank of the States. This was on the insistence of the larger States, which apprehended a shifting of the population to the West and South, which would ultimately subject the larger States, which would have the greater wealth, to the oppressive demands of the smaller States, and time has verified this prediction. Therefore, the method of apportionment was again recommitted to five members, who proposed a scheme whereby the first House of Representatives should consist of 56 Members, who were to be distributed among the States upon an estimate of their population, but authorized the Legislature, as future circumstances might require, to increase the number of Representatives and distribute them among the States upon a compound ratio of their wealth and the number of their inhabitants, and this was adopted.

It was then proposed that the first Congress should consist of 36 Members from States which held few or no slaves and 29 from the slave-holding States, and this was objectionable to the latter. Accordingly, a counterproposition was made to return to the principle of numbers alone and to provide a periodical census to adjust the shifting of their population or wealth, and to gain this provision for the future it was agreed to count the slaves on the basis of three-fifths of their numbers.

The subject was long and earnestly debated, and while I have no time to quote from the debates, which would be very illuminating, the fact remains that at no time during the debates was it suggested for a moment that aliens were not to be included among the inhabitants. The culmination of the debate came when the Northern States, speaking through Gouverneur Morris, agreed to accept the principle of the three-fifths rule, provided that direct taxation should be in proportion to representation. It was thought that this would result in an equitable balance, for if the slave-holding States had an undue advantage by the inclusion of three-fifths of the slaves, who were regarded as property, yet they would bear a correspondingly greater burden in the apportionment of direct taxes.

Accordingly a new resolution was referred to a committee of detail, which provided that the first Congress should consist of 65 Members, but that—> * * * the Legislature of the United States shall possess authority to regulate the number of Representatives in any of the foregoing cases upon the principle of their number of inhabitants, according to the provisions hereafter mentioned, namely, provided always, that representation ought to be proportioned according to direct taxation.

It then provided for a census to be taken within 6 years from the first Congress and thereafter every 10 years "of all of the inhabitants of the United States."

The committee of detail, after considering this proposition, reported that there should be one Representative for every 40,000 inhabitants, but another effort was made to exclude the slaves from the enumeration and the debate broke out afresh. The principle of a three-fifths allotment to the slave inhabitants was, however, retained and suffered no change when the draft of the Constitution was again referred to the committee of style and that committee reported the Constitution in its present form, which provided:

> Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to servitude for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons.

It is further provided:

> The number of Representatives shall not exceed 1 for every 40,000 people.

This remained unchanged, with the exception that Washington, as presiding officer, then broke his silence by expressing a wish that the number of Representatives should not exceed 1 for every 30,000, instead of 40,000, as theretofore, and this was adopted.

I apologize to the House for this very lengthy statement of the genesis of Article I, section 2, but if there be any who are inclined to support the thesis of the gentleman from Virginia, that the framers did not intend to include aliens in the enumeration, then this lengthy explanation will not be in vain, for it seems to me conclusive that when they deliberately used the expression "persons" in their method of enumeration, they used it in the comprehensive sense of all human beings who were inhabitants of the several States, except in so far as they expressly excluded persons who were Indians not taxed and slaves, the latter being enumerated on a purely artificial basis of three-fifths of their numbers.

It is clear that the framers never intended to leave the matter to the discretion of Congress. They compromised their differences by establishing a hard and fast rule, and they reaffirmed this when they adopted the fourteenth amendment, whereby it was provided that—

> Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed.

To argue that the Congress could at this late day arbitrarily exclude aliens from the enumeration would be a very dangerous step, and happily the Congress has refused to take it. If the Congress can exclude any class of inhabitants, it is difficult to understand where the destruction of the constitutional provision would stop. We have seen in the last nine years that even the positive mandate of the Constitution that there should be a reapportionment every decennial census has been violated. In my judgment, the two most fatal blows which have been struck against our form of government in recent years are the willful refusal for so many years to reapportion on the basis of the Constitution and the asserted right of the Senate to exclude a Senator who has been duly elected because, in its judgment, the State which accredited him had made an unwise choice. That either proposition could be seriously entertained makes one despair of the permanence of a written form of government.

I hope I owe the House no apology for this discussion of a question which for the time being may seem academic.

Can the discussion of any constitutional principle be academic? Certainly the subject assumes a gravely practical character when we reflect upon the wreckage of those portions of the Constitution, which were the basis of the great compact. Macaulay imagined a New Zealander of a later age who, standing upon a broken arch of London Bridge, would survey the ruins of the historic edifices of London, but a New Zealander who would study our Constitution as the fathers designed it and as it now exists would see in the subject matter of this discussion a greater wreckage.

Little is now left of the great compromise of the fathers. The sovereign States were to be represented in the Senate by representatives of their own choice. To-day the accepted doctrine is that the States only nominate Senators and that their final choice must be "with the advice and consent of the Senate." Such Senators were to be selected by the State legislatures. They are now elected in a popular election. Taxation was to go hand in hand with apportionment, but under the sixteenth amendment the larger part of the taxes have been levied for nine years past without apportionment among the several States and without regard to a decennial census or enumeration.

As a result the theory of equitable representation in proportion to the burdens of government, which was the great objective of the fathers, has been impaired.

"Can such things be and overcome us as a summer cloud without our special wonder?"

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 312) to provide for the fifteenth and subsequent decennial censuses, and to provide for apportionment of Representatives in Congress, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

On amendment No. 1: The Senate bill provided for a census of radio sets. The House amendment struck out this provision; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 2: The Senate bill provided for the taking of the census in the year 1929 and every 10 years thereafter. The House amendment changed "1929" to "1930"; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 3: The Senate bill provided for the beginning of the 3-year decennial census period on the 1st of July next preceding the census provided for in section 1. The House amendment changed this date to the 1st day of January, 1930, and every tenth year thereafter. The Senate recedes with an amendment making the date the 1st day of July, 1929, and every tenth year thereafter.

On amendment No. 4: The Senate bill provided that the tabulation of population should be completed within 12 months. The House amendment changed this to six months from the beginning of the enumeration. The Senate recedes with an amendment requiring the completion within 12 months from the beginning of the enumeration.

On amendment No. 5: The Senate bill provided for appointment by the Director of the Census of temporary employees in the District of Columbia for the taking of the census, with compensation not to exceed the compensation received by other civil-service employees engaged in like or comparable service. The House amendment struck out this limitation on the compensation and the Senate recedes.

On amendments Nos. 6, 7, and 8: The Senate bill provided—by the language proposed to be stricken out by amendment No. 6—that in the case of appointments in the executive branch of the Government in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, preference should be given to honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, marines, and their widows, and to wives of injured soldiers, sailors, marines if the husband was not qualified to hold the position. The Senate bill further provided—by the language proposed to be stricken out by amendment No. 7—that in making all appointments necessary to the taking of the census, preference should be given to American citizens and ex-service men and women. The Senate bill further provided—by the language proposed to be stricken out by amendment No. 8—that, in appointments to the field service for taking the census, appointments should be made subject to the civil service laws and that direct preference should be given to disabled veterans of wars in which the United States has been engaged.

The House, by amendments Nos. 6 and 7, proposes to strike out the first two of these provisions, and by amendment No. 8 proposes to strike out the third provision and to insert in lieu thereof the requirement that appointments in the field service should be made without reference to the civil service, but that preference should be given to disabled veterans of wars in which the United States has been engaged, and wives of disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines if the husband is not qualified for appointment.

The House recedes on amendment No. 6, which merely restates existing law, and the Senate recedes on amendments Nos. 7 and 8 with amendments providing:

(1) That in making any appointments under this act to positions in the District of Columbia or elsewhere first preference shall be given to honorably discharged United States veterans disabled in the line of duty during any war, to their widows, and to their wives if the husbands are not qualified for appointment; and

(2) That appointments to the field service under the act shall be without reference to civil service laws.

On amendment No. 9: The Senate bill provided that employees of the departments and independent offices of the Government may be employed and compensated for field work in connection with the fifteenth census, but that when so employed shall not be paid in the aggregate a greater compensation than they would receive for service in the positions held by them. The House amendment strikes out this limitation and inserts a provision that when so employed they shall not be subject to the provisions of section 1765 of the Revised Statutes or section 6 of the act of May 10, 1916, as amended by the act of August 29, 1916, which prohibit a person holding one position from receiving pay beyond a prescribed limit under another appointment or pay in addition to regular compensation unless authorized by law. The Senate recedes with an amendment omitting the limitation of the Senate bill and also the matter inserted by the House amendment, the latter being omitted as surplusage, since the Senate bill already provides that these employees, as well as officers and enlisted men engaged in enumerations at military posts, may be "employed and compensated" for census work.

On amendment No. 10: The Senate bill provided that the fifteenth and subsequent censuses should be restricted to population, agriculture, irrigation, drainage, distribution, unemployment, radio sets, and mines. The House amendment struck out of this list unemployment and radio sets. The Senate recedes with an amendment restoring the word "unemployment" to the list.

On amendment No. 11: The Senate bill provided that the census of population and agriculture should be taken as of the 1st day of November. The House amendment changed this to the 1st day of May; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 12: The Senate bill provided a fine of not exceeding $1,000 for persons offering or rendering any information or suggestion to any census employee engaged in enumeration of population with unlawful intent to cause an inaccurate enumeration. The House amendment provided, as an alternative penalty, imprisonment for not exceeding one year, or both; and the Senate recedes.

On amendments Nos. 13 and 14: The Senate bill provided for the taking of the census of agriculture and livestock in 1934 and every 10 years thereafter, the census to be taken as of the 1st day of November. The House amendment changed the beginning year to 1935 and the month to January; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 15: This is a clerical amendment; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 16: Section 22 of the Senate bill provided for the method of reapportioning the House under the fifteenth and subsequent decennial censuses. The House amendment strikes out the entire section and inserts a new section covering the same matter. The only differences (other than clerical amendments) are as follows:

(1) The Senate bill provided that the statement to be transmitted by the President to the Congress should contain an apportionment of the "existing number" of Representatives made by apportioning such number among the States according to their numbers as ascertained under the census "by the method used in the last preceding apportionment and also by the method of equal proportions." The corresponding portion of the House amendment provides that the statement should contain the number of Representatives to which each State would be entitled under an apportionment of the "then existing number" of Representatives made in each of the following manners: By the method used in the last preceding apportionment, by the method known as the method of major fractions, and by the method known as the method of equal proportions.

(2) The Senate bill provided that if the Congress to which the President's statement is transmitted fails to pass a reapportionment law, then each State shall be entitled to the number of Representatives shown in the statement, based on the method used in the last apportionment, until an apportionment law is enacted or a subsequent statement is submitted. The corresponding provision of the House amendment provides that the apportionment shall remain in effect until the taking effect of a reapportionment under this act or subsequent statute.

The Senate recedes on this amendment.

CARL R. CHINDBLOM,
E. HART FENN,
CLARENCE J. MCLEOD,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, this is a complete report from the committee on conference with reference to the census and apportionment bill (S. 312). On the part of the House, three managers signed the report as well as the statement. Two of the managers, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER], did not sign either of the documents. Therefore they did not concur in the conference report.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield? Let us have some agreement as to time.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I will say that there is one hour of debate, and, of course, I shall yield to gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me one-half the time, and I will yield to Members on both sides who are opposed to the conference report?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I see no objection to that. I shall yield one-half of the time, reserving the right to control the time at the end of the hour to move the previous question. In the meantime, Mr. Speaker, I yield one-half of the available time to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. GREEN. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield time to those who are in favor of the report?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I shall try to take care of all as nearly as I can.

Mr. Speaker, there were three main points in difference between the two Houses. The first was that relating to the time for taking the census or enumeration. The second was that relating to the provision in the Senate bill under which persons employed in the field work for taking the census were to be selected under civil service laws but without regard to the classification act of 1923. The third point of difference was with reference to two subjects of enumeration, the House having stricken out the item "radio sets" and there being some question as to the result of the action of the House on the subject of "unemployment." I will say as to the latter matter that the Senate conferees receded on the matter of taking the enumeration of radio sets.

With reference to unemployment, while there was some difference of opinion on the subject itself among the House conferees, we took the view that the term "unemployment" having been left in the bill in the first section and stricken out in a later section—section 4—together with "radio sets," there was a serious question whether the subject of including unemployment as a part of the enumeration was a matter of adjustment between the two Houses. The House conferees therefore agreed, the subject of unemployment having been retained by the House in the first section, that it was consistent to restore it in the subsequent section.

With reference to the civil-service provision the House by a very large vote, in fact it seemed to the present Speaker almost a unanimous vote—and he was in a position to observe the situation—the House struck out the provision in the Senate bill, putting the field employees for the census under the civil service.

When the conferees met we found that we wanted some more information from the Bureau of the Census, and we called in Doctor Steuart and Doctor Hill, of the Census Bureau. They gave us very valuable information. They were very closely interrogated by the conferees, particularly with reference to the time for taking the census, and the civil-service provisions or the effect of the civil-service provisions.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I am very anxious not to lose much time. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. COLLIER. It is not my purpose to ask an impertinent question, but I want to know if the House conferees seriously contended and held out until the last minute on differences in respect to the time of taking the census in the two bills? In other words, whether the House conferees fought as hard as they could and held out as long as they could on that proposition of taking the census in May, which was put into the bill by so tremendous a majority on the part of the House.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, the conferees first convened at 10 o'clock on Saturday morning. We continued our deliberations until 12 o'clock. We met again at 3 o'clock and adjourned at 5 o'clock, and practically all of the time in debate and discussion between the conferees was devoted to that particular subject of the time for taking the census. In addition, the gentlemen representing the Bureau of the Census were closely interrogated upon that subject and gave valuable information, which, I think, had some influence with the conferees.

With reference to the civil-service provision, there has been serious criticism of the action of the House in striking out that provision. That criticism has come from respectable sources. I have seen it in some newspaper editorials, for whose views I have a very high regard. I think there is misapprehension as to what this bill really would do in the matter of placing the employees under the civil service. There will be about 575 supervisors and probably a little larger number of assistant supervisors. The supervisors will take about $2,000 each, and probably serve about 8 or 10 months; we do not know positively. The assistant supervisors will earn about $150 for about three months' work. The special agents will not exceed 1,000 in number, and they will do exactly the same work that is done by the enumerators, the supervisors, and the assistant supervisors. They will be used to go out and check up and complete and expedite the work where it lags and where it has been inefficiently done. Most of them will earn from five to six dollars a day for the time they work, and some will be paid upon the piece-price basis. Their probable earnings will be $125 each. There will be 100,000 enumerators, and in the urban districts they will work about two weeks in taking the census and in the rural districts about four weeks. The average earnings of these enumerators will be $125 each. There will be 100,000 of them, to be selected throughout the country in the various districts where they take the census, so that the Civil Service Commission would have to hold an examination for some one in every one of these enumeration districts. Each enumerator will count about 2,000 people. There are, altogether, about 80,000 political subdivisions in the United States in which the enumeration will be made. The Census Bureau already has on hand 40,000 applications for these positions of enumerators. The Census Bureau has prepared all of the necessary papers for holding an examination of its own. Every applicant is required to fill out for himself a census blank or form with reference to himself and also to answer questions relating to the instructions and to certify that he has read them and understands them. The chances are that the Civil Service Commission could not hold any different examination from that, and the chances are also that there would have to be a substantial agreement that the Civil Service Commission would accept the work of the Census Bureau. Therefore, while I am entirely committed personally to the civil-service system in the Federal Government, I think that the action of the House was eminently proper, and it was sustained by the action of the conferees.

Mr. Speaker, with reference to the time of taking the census, the Senators were very insistent on that provision in the bill. They argued it very strongly, and personally I do not believe that we would have had an agreement upon the entire bill if the House conferees had not yielded upon it. Further, during the progress of the deliberations of the committee of conference the position of the Senate became rather more convincing to the majority of the conferees than it had theretofore been. Doctor Steuart and Doctor Hill told us very explicitly that they did not believe they could finish the enumeration and have the census completed so as to be able to prepare the statement which the President is required to file with Congress in December, 1930, for the purpose of preparing the way for apportionment of Members of the House if the census were taken in May, 1930. On that point they were very explicit and conclusive. The purpose of this legislation after all is to secure an apportionment. The Constitution itself provides only for an enumeration of the population. The other things which are added in the bill as subjects for enumeration are within the power of the Congress to require and to cause to be done, but the Constitution requires only an enumeration of the population for the purpose of securing an apportionment. So when the responsible authorities told us that they did not believe that they could complete the work in time in order that the House might have information which the bill itself required in portions which were not in dispute, eventually the majority of the House conferees receded, and I call special attention to the fact that so far as the apportionment is concerned nothing was in dispute upon that subject. We could not change that; we were bound by the provisions in the bill, and we believed it should by all means be made certain that the statement could be furnished by the Census Bureau during the first week in December in order that the House and the Senate might have material upon which to base an apportionment.

There were other differences between the two Houses in the bill, but as to all of them the Senate conferees agreed substantially to the amendments of the House. There has been some clarification here and there, especially with regard to the so-called Fish amendment in regard to disabled soldiers.

We restored the amendment which provided that all ex-service men should have preference. That is now the law. It was omitted largely because it was merely a repetition of the existing law. The conferees thought it would do no harm to repeat it, and the House conferees agreed to the Senate provision. With reference to disabled men, we found language both in the House amendment and in the Senate bill which was very peculiar. You will find it reads that—preference shall be given to disabled veterans of wars in which the United States have been engaged.

That is in the original Senate bill, and that is also in the so-called Fish amendment. In other words, a German veteran, for example, who was engaged in a war in which the United States was engaged—because that is the language—might be construed to have the preference here. Fortunately, we found in other provisions, particularly in amendment No. 7, that we were enabled to provide new language which will cover the whole matter properly, so that now, while a general preference is given to all ex-service men and women, special preference is given to disabled ex-service men, to widows of such men, and to the wives of ex-service men where their wives are qualified to perform the work and the husbands are not.

I now yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I will take only five minutes for myself and reserve the balance of my time.

I think the House is aware of the fact that this conference report is the culmination of one of the most unusual proceedings that this House has ever experienced of its kind. But I am not going to take up the time of the House to discuss that phase of the subject. We are going to oppose this conference report in order that we may go back, if possible, and have this date changed back to May.

I know that under pressure the Director and the officials of the Census Bureau finally changed positions and said just what some people wanted them to say with reference to the time for taking the census. But we have gone into that question thoroughly and they contended that the time to take the census would be May in order to get an accurate census of all the agricultural States. Now, they ask us to change it to November.

Do you know what that means? Instead of securing a readjustment of the population from the distortion made in the census of 1920 it will mean the loss of a Representative from Louisiana, 1 from Mississippi, 1 from Alabama, 1 from Tennessee, 2 from Kentucky, 1 from Virginia, 3 or 4 from Missouri, 1 from Kansas, 1 from Iowa, 1 from Nebraska, 1 from South Dakota, 1 from North Dakota, and 1 each from Maine and Vermont. Yet they propose to take this census in the wintertime, which will be most unfavorable to those States; in the wintertime, instead of in the spring, when you would find the farmers on their farms to a greater extent than at any other time in the year.

What goes with that representation? It will go to States with large alien populations. It goes to the large congested cities, if you please, with large alien populations.

Let me tell you gentlemen from those States that if you will reapportion your States according to the doctrine you have been preaching and voting for in the last few days you will strip the agricultural sections of those States of practically any representation at all, and I particularly refer to the State of Michigan.

How are you going to take the census of the farmers in Maine in the wintertime? I do not live in Maine, and you do not expect me to plead the cause of Maine; but when that State is under snow, how are you going to take a census of the potato growers who have been appealing here for relief? In North Dakota and in Nebraska and in the Southern States, particularly in the Cotton Belt, where the ravages of the boll weevil leave us so little cotton to pick that many of our people will be gone from their farms by November.

No, gentlemen: this is an extension of that movement here to increase the power of the large alien-congested centers of this country by reducing the number of Representatives from the agricultural sections of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I do not know how many more people there will be on our side who desire to speak. I would like to have the gentleman from Mississippi use the remainder of his 30 minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. How much time has the gentleman left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has 15 minutes remaining.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. THURSTON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. Speaker, there is just one phase of this matter to which I want to address myself at this time, and that is the date proposed for the taking of the census of persons. I want to refer to section 2 of Article I of the Constitution and one provision in that chapter. I read:

The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of 10 years, in such manner as they shall by law direct.

Now, we have heard a great deal here about the construction of the Constitution, and, of course, I would not attempt to stand here as a critic or as an expounder of that great instrument; but if we are to follow precedents, we know that all the prior enumerations have taken place within the respective decennial periods. In this respect, your Committee on the Census had this matter under consideration for several months last year, and in a bill presented last session, providing that the enumeration should be taken in the month of May, of course, had this provision in mind. And in the Chamber at the other end of this building a bill was written and brought in carrying the month of November, without the decennial period, so that if we gave consideration to the Constitution, as it has been construed for 130 of 140 years, we would say that it was then intended that the enumeration should be taken within a decennial period, and the 10-year period in this instance will not have elapsed until December 31, 1929; yet this bill proposes to have the enumeration taken two months prior, within the prior decennial period, and then it will be referred to as the census of 1929, instead of the census of 1930. A precedent, indeed! If we are to give fair construction to this great instrument, I believe it will be agreed that the framers thought that the full 10-year period should elapse before the enumeration was had. So if we do want to revere and give weight to precedent and sustain the clear intent of this provision of the Constitution, then we will follow the practice that has been adhered to since the formation of our Government and have the census taken in the zero year.

Now, ladies and gentlemen, this bill was prepared in the Senate without hearings, so we are not obliged to give any great weight or consideration to the deliberations that were had at the other end of the Capitol on this subject, because it was plainly apparent from the bill that was sent over here that the subject matter had not been so thoroughly considered as in this Chamber, because many important amendments were adopted to this bill when it was brought to the House.

The House Committee on the Census determined that the month of May would be the best time for this work, and their judgment was confirmed here last week when by a vote of at least 2 or 3 and possibly 4 to 1 when the Committee of the Whole again amended the bill finding that the month of May would be the best month. What situation has intervened in the meantime that would cause this House to change its position upon this subject? Surely there has been no evidence adduced or offered to this body or to the conferees that would warrant them in making that change. So I feel I am obliged to dissent from the conference report because I believe it proposes a violation of the Constitution and fixes an unsatisfactory date for this work.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THURSTON. Yes.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. What did the hearings of the committee disclose as to enough time between May and December to take this census?

Mr. THURSTON. It was agreed by the members of the Census Bureau that were sent down to the Census Committee that the enumeration of persons could be concluded in from 30 to 60 days. Now, a great deal of confusion has been thrown into this bill because there is an enumeration of distribution and many other matters that have no direct bearing on the census portion of this bill; the testimony was undisputed before the committee that the enumeration could be had in at least 60 days, and if that is true, there would be ample time to get it before the Congress by December 1. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. SNOW].

Mr. SNOW. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] has asked how a fair enumeration can be taken in Maine in November and December, and I will answer his question. A fair and accurate enumeration can not be made. Weather conditions in that State during November and December are such that a just, thorough, and complete enumeration can not then be taken. Whether this movement to change date from May 1 to November 1 is actuated by those who wish to favor the large cities at the expense of our agricultural districts, or to favor Doctor Steuart, the Director of the Census, who, by the way, also seems to have the faculty of changing his mind, I do not know and I do not care. But let me say to you in all fairness that if you pass this bill incorporating November 1 in it as the day census enumeration is to begin you will be doing a very unfair thing to my State, and I say it without any fear of contradiction.

Mr. COLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNOW. Yes.

Mr. COLE. And to all the Northern States. It is an utter impossibility to take the census in those States in November. We tried that in 1920, in January, and it was a complete failure.

Mr. PALMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNOW. Yes.

Mr. PALMER. I want to ask the gentleman from Maine if it is not a fact that it would discriminate against the farm classes all over the United States?

Mr. SNOW. I am not familiar with conditions in other States, and can only speak for my own State.

Mr. ROMJUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNOW. Yes.

Mr. ROMJUE. If the bill is passed with this provision in it, would it not result in the condition that existed when they took the preceding census?

Mr. SNOW. I see no other answer to it than yes. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] has just stated that the conferees called in Doctor Steuart and Doctor Hill. As far as I go, I do not care if they even called in Doctor Bunyan. According to the letter read by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON] on the floor of the House last week, Doctor Steuart was apparently in favor of having the enumeration begin in May or June, as it has begun in all other censuses except one, and why Doctor Steuart has now changed his mind is a mystery. I realize that nothing can now be done, but I simply want to inflict myself upon this House long enough to go on record and protest against an enumeration which, to use a familiar expression of the streets, will "gyp" my State out of thousands of persons in the enumeration. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER]. [Applause.]

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen of the House, in the limited time at my command I can not discuss in detail several objections to this conference report. I think a very much better census and reapportionment bill could have been written, but as the measure has passed the Senate and, as amended, has passed the House, the only problem confronting us is to reconcile the bill as it passed the Senate with the bill as it passed the House. In other words, the disagreement between the House and Senate as to the provisions of this bill must be ironed out if the measure is to become a law, and while there are a large number of very grave objections to this bill the outstanding issue is as to the date on which the census shall be taken.

I have insisted from the beginning that if the census is taken in November, or any other winter month, millions of men and women who live on the farms will be absent from their homes working in cities and industrial centers. It is a well-known fact that there are more people at home on the farms in the spring of the year than at any other time of the year, because the young men who have been working in the cities in the winter return to their farm homes in spring to begin preparations for their crops. A census taken in April or May will show a farm population many millions in excess of what would be shown by a census taken in November or any other winter month. Almost without exception, for 140 years, the census has been taken in the spring or early summer for the simple reason that more people are at home at that time than during the winter months.

On January 1, 1920, when the census was taken, millions of young men from the farms were working in industrial plants in the great cities and, of course, were not counted as a part of the population in the States where they really lived. As a result, the census of 1920 was very unfair to the agricultural population and a reapportionment based on the 1920 census would have unjustly deprived the agricultural States of about 20 Members of Congress and of about 20 votes in the Electoral College, and it can not be denied that if the next census is taken in November and December millions of men who actually live on farms will be temporarily absent in the cities working in industrial plants or temporarily employed in the great centers of wealth and population. It is of very great importance to the agricultural classes to have this census taken at a time when they will all be enumerated, which will mean that agriculture will get its just proportion of the Members of the House and votes in the Electoral College.

If this conference report is adopted and this bill becomes operative, it will deprive the great agricultural States and the agricultural classes of from 20 to 30 votes in the Electoral College and from 20 to 30 Members in the House of Representatives. There is no question in the world as to this being the effect that will follow the adoption of the conference report.

Now, I want to impress this fact upon the Representatives in this House from the great agricultural districts: That your constituents are vitally interested in having this census taken in the spring of the year; otherwise the farming classes will not be accurately enumerated and the agricultural States will have their membership in the House and their representation in the Electoral College unjustly reduced.

In my opinion, no greater calamity could befall the agricultural group than to have its population enumerated in November, at a time when millions of farmers or the members of their families are absent from the farm homes working in the great industrial cities. I have aggressively insisted on the enactment of a worth-while farm relief measure—something that will rehabilitate American agriculture and place the farmer on an equality with the other vocational groups. Congress is about to enact a farm bill. If this bill is unsatisfactory, and it is, we will have a chance to pass another one later on.

I am sure the country will be very much dissatisfied with the tariff bill that recently passed the House, because it will impose additional burdens on the farming class; but this vicious tariff bill may be repealed at an early session of Congress. This census bill in its present form will bring disaster to agriculture. The bad effects flowing from taking the census in November will be more permanent and serious to agriculture than a bad farm bill or a bad tariff bill. If this conference report on the census bill is adopted, the great agricultural States and the agricultural classes of the United States will be deprived of from 20 to 30 Representatives in Congress and from 20 to 30 votes in the Electoral College, to which they are justly entitled under a fair enumeration of population; and this loss will not be temporary, but for all time. These 20 or 30 Members of the House and these 20 or 30 votes in the Electoral College will be taken away from the agricultural classes and given to the industrial States. A census taken in November will give the cities and industrial States a big advantage over the agricultural classes for the reason that several million men who in reality live on the farms and who should be counted as a part of the farm population will be absent from the farms in November.

This is a crisis in the history of American agriculture. It is important to get an accurate census of farm products, crops, yield per acre, distribution, and so forth; but a census relating to these matters sinks into insignificance when compared with the importance of securing an accurate population census of the farming classes in the United States, because if the census is taken at a time when a considerable proportion of the farm population is temporarily absent from the farms and at work in the great cities, such an enumeration will not accurately show the farming population and the agricultural classes will thereby be deprived of a large number of Members of the House and a large number of votes in the Electoral College.

There is no reason why this census should be taken in midwinter. In many States the roads will be covered with snow and impassable. The severity of the weather will render an accurate census almost impossible. On the other hand, in a census taken in the cities and industrial districts in the winter few people would be overlooked or omitted, because it is easy to make an enumeration in the cities even in winter.

Now, why can not this census be taken in May? When the officials of the Bureau of the Census appeared before the committee of the House it was not contended by them that November was a better month than May in which to take the census, and there was no claim made that it would require 8 or 10 months to ascertain the population after the enumeration had been made, nor was it contended that a census taken in May would be too late to enable the population to be ascertained by the time Congress meets in December following.

Please bear in mind that for the purposes of reapportionment it is not necessary to complete the entire census by the time Congress convenes in December. It is only necessary to complete the population census, and this can be done in six or seven months, because the Census Bureau will have an adequate force and the best possible equipment. The Director of the Census testified that he expects to have the enumeration of the cities completed in two weeks from the time the census starts, and the enumeration of the country districts completed within 30 days; so, according to the undisputed evidence, the Census Bureau will have from June 1 to the first week in December to check over the enumeration lists and ascertain the population. These lists will come from the census districts in sheets containing fifty names, and it will not take long to get the total, as one clerk can count several thousands of these lists in a day.

The census of 1900 was taken June 1, and in November the final revised population was announced by the Director of the Census—within about five months from the time the enumeration began. The 1910 census was taken April 15, and on December 10 the final revised population statistics were published by the Bureau of the Census. The 1920 census was taken January 1, and within a few months the population of the United States was available.

As early as June, 1920, in about five months after the 1920 census was taken, the population census of practically all the great cities of the United States was available and published.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman from Mississippi yield me three minutes more?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman from Missouri three additional minutes.

Mr. WOODRUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOZIER. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. WOODRUM. As I understand, the Census Committee of the House, when they considered and reported the census bill in the last Congress, unanimously reported that the census should be taken on the May date; is that correct?

Mr. LOZIER. Yes. There was no disagreement between the Democratic and Republican members of the Census Committee as to the best date to take the census. A winter date would be very unfair to agriculture, and a spring date would be fair to all classes, whether they live in the city or country.

Mr. McLEOD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LOZIER. No; I have only a few minutes left. Gentlemen, I am tremendously interested in having the census taken in the spring of the year, because more men and women will be on the farms at that time than any part of the year. I want all the farming population to be counted. I want the agricultural States and the agricultural population counted so they may have their share of the membership of the House and their share of the electoral votes. If millions of farmers are counted in the industrial centers when they should be counted on the farm, the agricultural classes will lose representation in the House and votes in the Electoral College. By taking the census in November you are taking from 20 to 30 Members of Congress away from the farming States and giving them to the great cities and industrial States. The future of agriculture is involved in these dates. If the agricultural States lose these Members now, we will never get them back. This next census must be fair to agriculture, and those who belong to the agricultural classes should be counted when they are on the farm and not when they may be working temporarily in some factory in another State.

I appeal to the Democrats and Republicans who come from agricultural States to forget their politics for the time being and stand together in favor of having this census taken at a time when the farm people will be counted and credited to the State in which they live and not counted and credited to a State in which they may be temporarily working during the winter months. You Republicans from Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, the Dakotas, and in fact every Member of this House who comes from an agricultural district should vote to have this census taken at a time that will give to the agricultural classes their true population. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GREGORY].

Mr. GREGORY. Mr. Speaker, there are many distinguished members of the Republican Party who sit in this body for whom I have the highest personal regard. They hail from that section upon which George Rogers Clark and his intrepid band of Kentucky sharpshooters stamped the genius of American ownership and American civilization. They hail from the great plains beyond the mighty Father of Waters, whose fertile yields are capable of filling the granaries of the world with foodstuffs sufficient to meet the requirements of earth's multiplied millions. They hail from the majestic Rockies, beneath whose splintered peaks and star-daring crags lie untold riches in silver and gold. They hail from the fruitful lands which fringe the sunset sea. I love them all, because their hearts are wonderfully attuned to the needs of the great toiling masses of the Nation, but more particularly to the needs of the downtrodden and oppressed farmer. My heart was thrilled when I heard their clarion demand for this special session of the Congress to enact laws and fashion legislation which would place agriculture upon a basis of economic equality with other lines of human endeavor. I sat here with bated breath and sympathetic heart as I heard these same Republican Members of the House bringing to their command all the blandishments of rhetoric and all of the persuasions of logic, plead for the rights of the farmer and denounce the provisions of the Hawley tariff bill, including the iniquitous sugar schedule. In fact, my heart was almost moved with compassion toward the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TIMBERLAKE] as I saw him, apparently solitary and alone, fighting for the sugar interests. After hearing the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] and others denounce the Great Western Sugar Co., with its Mexican and child labor, I thought that organization, which produces about 50 per cent of all of the beet sugar made in this country, was almost friendless and that it would have to be contented with a continuation of its annual earning of 45 per cent on its watered stock. But then I did not know the mind of the distinguished majority leader quite so well as the gentleman from Colorado must have understood it. Then the now famous alleged Tom, Dick, and Harry interview had not been given to the press. I thought the Tom, Dick, and Harry representatives of the plain people might vote as they had talked. But the immortal, omnipotent, and omniscient 15 Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee decreed otherwise, and these other Republicans, with good Democratic hearts but with mean Republican heads, who speak so eloquently for the farmer and who vote so consistently against his interests, heard their master's voice and the tariff bill went through with a "big whoopee."

I confess that I do not quite understand the gentlemen who hail from the sections to which I have referred. Their like can nowhere be found among human beings. Their counterpart in one respect, at least, is found in a certain disreputable bug, well known to all youthful students of "bugology." Even the distinguished majority leader, before shaking the dust of sunny Tennessee from his feet and casting his fortunes with the East, must have whiled away some of his youthful hours in observing the habits of this bug. Must I describe it? Well, its chief characteristic is that it looks in one direction while it always pushes in an opposite direction. So it is with these so-called progressive Republicans. They speak eloquently for the farmer on the hustings, in political platforms, and even in this Chamber; but when the whip is cracked above their heads, they always tumble the ball of legislative favoritism into the laps of their big city brethren.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I indulge in no illusions of hope with respect to the fate of the conference report on the pending census and reapportionment bill. Many of these gentlemen on the Republican side bitterly complained against the plan of robbing American farmers of seats in this body by giving to several millions of individuals who acknowledge no allegiance to the flag of our Republic, and who chant the praises of their masters in an alien tongue, representation here. But they voted for this un-American measure. By an overwhelming vote, this House decided to follow the plain mandate of the Constitution and the precedent of more than a century with reference to the year and season in which the census should be taken, namely, at the decennial period in the springtime when farmers are at home and are accessible to the enumerators. The House conferees, headed by a gentleman who was not a member of the Census Committee and who hails from the second largest city in the land, have said by this report that the census must be taken in an off year and at a time when the rural sections can not be conveniently reached, and when the great industrial centers are filled with farmer boys seeking labor until the beginning of another crop season. Is this another plan to increase urban representation in this body? Is this another scheme to further stifle the voice of the American farmer in the affairs of the Government of which he is the chief bulwark and support? Whatever may have been in the minds of the conferees, that is the effect of the conference report.

In the name of the rural sections of the Nation, I protest against the adoption of this conference report; and, unlike many of the so-called Republican friends of the farmer, I shall take pleasure in voting against it. [Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I find little consolation in this conference report. This conference report is not in accord with the views expressed by this House upon two very important matters. It is not in accord with the sentiment of the House on the subject of unemployment. It is not in accord with the overwhelming majority opinion expressed in this House with reference to the time for taking the census.

I can not understand why the great agricultural interests of this country have had no consideration in the deliberation on this conference report. There is not a farmer acquainted with farm interests who does not know that the worst time in the year to take a census of farm products and those upon the farm would be in November. There is not a farmer who does not know that the best time for taking the census is in May or June.

I wish every Member of the House would hark back to the census taken in January, 1920. Everybody knows that it was a failure. That failure was attributed to its being taken in the winter, in January. Nobody could rely on it. The urban sections of the country repudiated it and took independent censuses in order that they might not suffer by reason of the unfair report made by the Census Department.

Likewise the country suffered because of the fact that it was an untrue situation with reference to conditions existing in the country, and an untrue situation with reference to the people living in the country. This report should be defeated, and the voice of this House should prevail for the reason that we are the representatives of the people of this country. We are supposed to do that which is best for the interests of the people of the country, and we should not be led astray in the discharge of that duty. I hope this conference report will be defeated. Send it back, and the conferees then, with a renewed determination on behalf of this House, will see to it that the voice of the people is carried out as was so forcibly expressed in this House. [Applause.]

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLEOD].

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to call attention to some of the facts brought out in the discussion this morning. As a member of the conference committee I say that one of the strongest arguments used in the conference was the fact that every farm organization in the United States which is represented by any official organ took a stand strongly against the early date and advocated that of November. They stated that that is the best time for agriculture, the choicest time. Also it was suggested here a moment ago that the census might be completed if taken in May or June, or possibly back as far as April. Doctor Hill and Doctor Steuart at a conference committee meeting, when they were called to represent the Bureau of the Census, said that they have always done their best to complete the census in six months, but that it never has been done. They did not say that it was impossible but said that the completion of the census had never been accomplished in six months. Therefore they strongly advocated the November date, stating that, in their opinion, this date was by far preferable.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SUMMERS].

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Members of this House from the rural districts whether they would prefer to go in November and December to the highways and the byways of the country to find the people or would they go in May, when they could drive any place? I want you gentlemen to vote the way you would do yourselves if you were going to take this census. I believe that not one man from the northern country would undertake to do the work in November, but that if he had his preference he would go in May. The Constitution of the United States says that we shall take this census every 10 years. Are we going to take it according to the Constitution, or are we going to take the census twice within this 10-year period. I am going to do as nearly as I know how what the Constitution directs instead of yielding to expediency. [Applause.]

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. FENN].

Mr. FENN. Mr. Speaker, I just want to say in this connection in regard to the month of November that everyone within the sound of my voice is familiar with the fact that we vote in November. We vote for the President and we vote for other officials in November. We find it an exceptionally good time of the year to vote.

Mr. ROMJUE. And has not one of the greatest complaints been in respect to the exercise of suffrage, that half the vote does not turn out?

Mr. FENN. I never heard that. It is not true in my State.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. And we just go once to vote in November, instead of being at it every day for 30 days.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, all of the Members who voted for the apportionment bill can afford to vote for the motion to recommit that I shall offer to change this date back to May. It will not conflict with, nor will hamper in the slightest, the apportionment bill which passed the House the other day. In respect to the matter of time, if we should take the census in May or June, it has been shown that they would have ample time in which to prepare the figures for the December session of Congress, and they have always said before that they had ample time.

Let me say to you gentlemen who come from States with large cities in them, that if you take this census in November and carry out the apportionment accordingly, it will concentrate your representation into those large cities. I ask the Members from rural Illinois to listen to this: Rural Illinois, Mr. DENISON, will be flagrantly discriminated against if you take this census in the wintertime, as proposed here, and Chicago and the larger cities will benefit. Permit me to say to you gentlemen from Michigan and Wisconsin, you men representing the farmers, the agricultural people, the backbone of the country, that if this census is taken in the wintertime, and then the apportionment is carried out accordingly, it will tend to concentrate the representation from those States into those large cities, and cut down the power and the voice of your agricultural people in this House.

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield for a question.

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is absolutely mistaken.

Mr. RANKIN. I decline to yield for an argument.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, every agricultural organization in the United States has advocated the taking of this census in November. [Applause.] The former Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Jardine, not only proposed but urged that this census be taken in November.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I am not going to yield until I have stated what I have to say. It is surprising that gentlemen should rise here and try to say to intelligent men and women that November is in the winter. I say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COLE] that the month of November is one of the finest months of the year in Iowa, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, and Wisconsin. [Applause.] And I do not believe there is much snow in Maine in the month of November.

Mr. SNOW. The gentleman better come up there and see.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Of course, the thought is father to the child. Some States are going to lose representation here and I do not blame them for opposing this legislation, but let us do it upon the merit and not on subterfuge. We hold our elections in November. We make canvasses in all of the election districts in the United States in October and November.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I can not yield. Before the Census Committee a representative of the Agricultural Department appeared who called attention to the fact that the Department of Agriculture had taken typical or experimental censuses in one township in every county, and they found that in the month of November there are more people upon the farms in the United States than in the month of May.

There are 2,000,000 tenant farmers in the United States who change their habitations in March and April, so that by May 1 you have an entirely new population generally on the tenanted farms.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman is mistaken about April, just as he is about May.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana, who complained about the retention of the word "unemployment," that he knows the rules of the House as well as any other Member. The word "unemployment" was left in this bill in the first section, and therefore it was not within the power of the conferees to omit the word "unemployment" in that section.

Mr. WOOD. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. WOOD. Then what was the purpose of having the word taken out in the second section?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Because the gentleman himself introduced a single amendment in the Committee of the Whole to strike out both "radio sets" and "unemployment" in section 4, while in section 1 separate amendments had been offered on each of these items. That caused the confusion. If the gentleman had offered an amendment on each item there would have been no misunderstanding. The vote subsequently in the House was 189 in favor of keeping in the word "unemployment" and 188 against it. The gentleman certainly would not expect a member of the conference to come in here with a conference report that was plainly subject to a point of order.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM] spoke upon this matter during the debate and called attention to the attitude of the agricultural organizations. He said:

> In my humble judgment a census taken in November will be fully as accurate from a population standpoint as a census taken in May, and from the standpoint of agriculture there can be no possible reason why anyone should prefer a census taken in May to a census taken in November.
> * * * Anyone who is at all familiar with farm conditions will certainly agree that if you go to a farmer in November who has been operating a farm for the past year you will get from him a more nearly accurate picture of his farm operations for that year than you will get from the man who occupies that farm in the succeeding May and, consequently, for the reason that I believe that that census will be very much more nearly accurate I sincerely trust that the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi will be rejected and that the bill as passed by the Senate, where full consideration was given to this proposition, will be adopted in its stead.
> In the closing minutes of my time I want to say that not only is the viewpoint expressed by the farm organizations in favor of a census in November, 1929, true, but it is also true that the Secretary of Agriculture and the former Secretary of Commerce, now President of the United States, are on record as favoring the November date for taking of the combined census of agriculture and population.

And he called attention to the fact that the agricultural organizations have uniformly advocated the adoption of the month of November, and he said that he had in his possession the recommendations of those organizations.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman explain——

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I have not the time to yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois declines to yield.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. KETCHAM, our colleague from Michigan, was formerly master of the State grange of Michigan, and I venture to say he knows whereof he speaks. He says here that May would be a better time, so far as the farmer is concerned. I do not profess to have a personal acquaintance with conditions on the farm such as others may have, but I am told that when November arrives the people can conveniently receive the census enumerators, because they have about finished up their work and have not yet begun to leave the farm for the winter.

In addition to that, people in this country who go to winter resorts are still at their homes, and those who go to summer resorts have not yet left their homes. We know the exodus occurs chiefly in the early part of the year. Of course, they begin to go in the winter, but they are not on short vacations, such as we have in the summer time. I am speaking of people who go abroad and who go to the resorts in the early spring.

Some reference has been made in this discussion to the question of constitutionality, with reference to the date for taking the census. I will dwell on that briefly.

The provision of the Constitution in section 2 of Article I is that—

> The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of 10 years, in such manner as they shall by law direct.

The first census was taken as of the first Monday in August, 1790, and the same date was used in the censuses in 1800, 1810, and 1820. In 1830 the date was changed to June 1, and this date was continued up to and including the year 1900. In 1910 the date was changed to April 15, and in 1920 to January 1. It appears plain, therefore, that the decennial period, called in the Constitution "within every subsequent term of 10 years," actually runs from the first Monday in August, 1790, whose corresponding date would be the first Monday in August, 1930, and therefore the dates of May 1, 1930, and November 1, 1929, are exactly on a par, so far as constitutionality is concerned.

The enumeration provided by the Constitution relates exclusively to population and is clearly intended to be the basis for the apportionment of Representatives among the several States. There can be no doubt that the provision of the Constitution is complied with if the enumeration is made at such times and under such circumstances as to furnish such basis for apportionment at the time when such apportionment should be made. The first enumeration or census clearly made possible an apportionment during the life of the first Congress, which ran from March 4, 1789, to March 3, 1791. Clearly a census taken in November, 1929, will provide a basis for an apportionment during the life of the present Congress, the Seventy-first, which runs from March 4, 1929, to March 3, 1931. If by any chance an enumeration were made so late as not to make possible an apportionment based thereon during the life of the Congress directing the enumeration, it would seem that the intent of the Constitution may not have been complied with.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. COLE. August 1 is a better time than November. We have never had a census taken in November.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. But this date is in accord with the bill, which provides an arrangement for the possible passage of an apportionment law by Congress at the short session. I think the very purpose of the enumeration provision in the Constitution was to secure an enumeration which would furnish a basis of apportionment during the life of the Congress following the census or enumeration, and when you have complied with that provision you have substantially complied with the requirements of the Constitution. This bill will provide the machinery by which an apportionment may be made by this Congress in the short session of the Seventy-first Congress, and if you change this plan so that it will be impossible for the Census Bureau to finish its enumeration of the population in time you may nullify the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution, because, even if not strictly mandatory, the requirement of the Constitution that an apportionment shall follow a census or enumeration is plainly directory and should be obeyed by the Representatives of the people.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER] said that you can take the census of the population within less time than you can all of the other proposed enumerations. That is true, but the enumerators must get all of the information. By the action of the House and Senate at this time we have added two very large subjects—distribution and unemployment—which have never been the subject of enumeration heretofore. That will add more labor to the work of the enumerator than there ever has been before. The subject of unemployment particularly will cause the raising of a great many difficult questions and problems for the Census Bureau to solve. They will have to lay down the rules and methods along which that enumeration shall be made; so also with reference to distribution, the marketing processes, which subject was advocated by Secretary of Commerce Hoover, and which was put in this bill largely in response to his request.

Mr. Speaker, under the general leave to extend remarks on this bill, I will add some observations on the Tilson amendment, which was not in any wise changed by the conferees. It was discussed, however, in our deliberations as to one phase.

In the Tilson amendment, as well as in the original section 22 of the Senate bill, to which the Tilson amendment was offered as a substitute, it is provided that on the first day, or within one week thereafter, of the second regular session of the Seventy-first Congress, the President shall transmit to the Congress the result of the census enumeration and also the number of Representatives to which each State would be entitled under an apportionment of the then existing number of Representatives among the several States according to the respective numbers of the several States as ascertained under such census by the method used in the last preceding apportionment, no State, however, to receive less than one Member. The question has been raised whether the method used in the last apportionment, that of 1911, can be definitely ascertained. Doctor Hill stated before the conferees that the method then used was that of major fractions. In the report submitted by the House Committee on the Census on April 25, 1911, being report No. 12 of the Sixty-second Congress, first session, this language occurs:

> The method of allowing one Member for each full ratio and one for each major fraction thereof was adopted by the committee. This method is easy to understand and is regarded by the committee as approaching as nearly an equitable and uniform distribution of the membership of the House among the several States as can be arrived at by other methods suggested. This method has been denominated the method of "major fractions" and is thus defined:
> "The method of major fractions selects a ratio, divides this ratio into the population of the several States, and assigns an additional Representative for each major fraction, disregarding every minor fraction."

In the Senate report submitted on July 6, 1911, on the same bill in report No. 94, Sixty-second Congress, first session, the same language was used in the following portion of the report:

The method of allowing one Member for each full ratio and one for each major fraction thereof was adopted by the committee. This method is easy to understand and is regarded by the committee as approaching as nearly an equitable and uniform distribution of the membership of the House among the several States as can be arrived at by other methods suggested. This method has been denominated the method of "major fractions" and is thus defined:

"The method of major fractions selects a ratio, divides this ratio into the population of the several States, and assigns an additional Representative for each major fraction, disregarding every minor fraction."

Now, Mr. Speaker, just one word in conclusion. I am satisfied that if we want reapportionment now, the way to get it is to adopt this conference report. Notwithstanding the intimations of some gentlemen here, I went into this conference with the determination to secure the retention of as much as was possible of the action of the House, and the House succeeded in this conference in every particular except this single item of the time for taking the census, and I am satisfied the plan proposed by the conference report is workable.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no motion to recommit is permissible.

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, yes, it is.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RANKIN moves to recommit the conference report to the committee of conference, with instructions to the managers on the part of the House to hold out for the taking of the census in May, 1930, instead of November, 1929.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a motion to recommit is not in order at the present time. The House must first be given an opportunity to either accept or reject the conference report. If it rejects the conference report, then a motion to recommit may be in order to instruct the conferees. The motion to recommit is virtually a motion to instruct the conferees.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, of course, after the conference report is either voted up or down, then it is entirely too late for a motion to recommit. The motion is now in order, and if there is any question I would be glad to be heard on that point.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman does not question the fact that if we voted down the conference report we could instruct the conferees to adhere?

Mr. CANNON. The pending motion carries instructions, and if offered at all must be offered before the vote is taken on agreeing to the conference report.

The motion to recommit a conference report is highly privileged and if the Chair entertains any doubt as to its privilege I would like to cite sections 5645 to 6553, inclusive, and especially a decision by Speaker GILLETT made in the first session of the Sixty-seventh Congress covering this particular form of instruction.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think there is any question at all that a motion to recommit is in order at this stage of the proceedings. The conferees are still in existence, and a motion to recommit can always be made after the previous question has been ordered. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 160, nays 136, not voting 132, as follows:

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Mr. DENISON rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to submit some parliamentary inquiries, but before doing so I want to speak briefly on a question of the privilege of the House. Section 364 of Jefferson's Manual reads as follows:

> It is a breach of order in debate to notice what has been said on the same subject in the other House, or the particular votes or majorities on it there; because the opinion of each House should be left to its own independency, not to be influenced by the proceedings of the other; and the quoting them might beget reflections leading to a misunderstanding between the two Houses.

I read section 366 also:

> Neither House can exercise any authority over a Member or officer of the other, but should complain to the House of which he is, and leave the punishment to them.
> Where the complaint is of words disrespectfully spoken by a Member of another House, it is difficult to obtain punishment, because of the rules supposed necessary to be observed (as to the immediate noting down of words) for the security of Members. Therefore it is the duty of the House, and more particularly of the Speaker, to interfere immediately, and not to permit expressions to go unnoticed which may give a ground of complaint to the other House, and introduce proceedings and mutual accusations between the two Houses, which can hardly be terminated without difficulty and disorder.

Mr. Speaker, in all legislative bodies that are composed of two chambers it is fundamental, I think, that no statements should be made in either chamber referring adversely to the proceedings of the other. All applicable rules of parliamentary procedure are made for the purpose of expediting legislation, of encouraging good feeling, and preventing ill-feeling and recriminations between the two legislative bodies. If the Members of either legislative Chamber should be permitted to criticize or adversely comment on either the proceedings of the other Chamber or the statements or conduct of its Members while engaged in the performance of their official duties, legislation would often be retarded or even defeated.

So we find the parliamentary law well settled in this country, as I have just read from Mr. Jefferson's Manual, that it is improper in either House of our Congress to refer to the debate in the other, to refer to the Members of the other body by name, to adversely comment on the proceedings in the other Chamber, or in any manner to indulge in criticism of either the other Chamber or its Members.

Now, this old rule of parliamentary procedure has been up in both Houses a number of times. Since I have been a Member of this Chamber it has been almost uniformly respected by the Members and enforced by the Speaker. I have never seen or known of many very flagrant violations of this fundamental rule by Members of the House, and I wish to call attention, Mr. Speaker, briefly, because I think this is a matter that ought to be brought to the attention of all the Members of this Chamber as well as of the other Chamber, to a few instances of the application of this principle by Speakers of the House and Presidents of the Senate to show how carefully this wholesome and important rule has been guarded and enforced.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. What is before the House? Why all this lecture?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] is assuming to present a question of privilege of the House.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I think we have the right to know what it is based on. Of course, we know the rules of the House, most of us, or at least we are supposed to know them; and if there has been any violation of the rules in either House we certainly are entitled to hear the indictment before the trial and the argument of counsel.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands the custom, questions of the privileges of the House are raised by the presenting of a resolution. The Chair has been listening to the gentleman to find out whether his remarks were introductory to the offering of a resolution.

Mr. RANKIN. I am in sympathy with the Chair in that respect. I have been listening for the same reason, and in vain.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. DENISON. I was endeavoring, Mr. Speaker, to call attention to the rule and I stated that I desired to call attention to a few of the applications of it among the precedents of the House as a preliminary to a further discussion of whether or not the rule had been violated in the instances I am going to mention, and with a further view to propounding a parliamentary inquiry to the Speaker. Of course, if the Speaker thinks I should do so in advance, I will now read what I desire to call to the attention of the House.

I find, Mr. Speaker, in reading the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of last Saturday—and I am reading these excerpts from the RECORD, Mr. Speaker, not for the purpose of criticizing anyone, or mentioning any names, because in raising this question I do not myself want to violate the rule that I have just mentioned; but in order to raise a question of the privilege of the House I have to call attention to the parts of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD which I think are pertinent.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. As I understand, the gentleman is going to base his parliamentary inquiry and the question of privilege of the House on proceedings that were had in another body.

Mr. DENISON. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Let me ask the gentleman whether he does not think that intensifies the situation since this body, as I understand it, has no jurisdiction of anything that has happened in another body. If this House is going to undertake to correct the RECORD or assert the privileges of the House with reference to something that happened in the other body, are you not just intensifying the situation?

Mr. DENISON. I am assuming that both Chambers will be controlled by a proper consideration of this parliamentary rule and a generous disposition to respect it if attention is called to it.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman will yield further, let me make this suggestion to the gentleman: If anything happens in the House of Representatives that does not suit the membership of the other body, I know of no remedy that they have, and I know of no remedy that we may have with respect to what is said in another body, and to agitate or to discuss it to any extent, as the gentleman is doing, in my opinion, only brings on the very thing that the gentleman says ought not to happen, and that is, differences of opinion as to what may happen in one body concerning the other.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I prefaced my remarks by stating that I do not rise for the purpose of indulging in any criticism whatever, but if this parliamentary rule which applies to both Houses of the Congress is violated by either or is disregarded by the Members of either, one of the parliamentary inquiries I intended to propound in a few minutes, if the gentleman from Texas had not anticipated me, was to inquire as to what rights the other Chamber has in connection with the matter, and what procedure we ought to take or can take to call the matter to the attention of the other Chamber.

In this connection I merely want to read briefly from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 2565, under date of June 8:

As I understood the Senator——

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I submit a point of order so you may determine the matter yourself. As I understand, it is a violation of the rules of the House of Representatives for any Member of this body to refer to what occurred in another body. If this is true, the gentleman from Illinois is violating the rules by referring to what occurred in another body, because he is undertaking to read it here in order to determine what the House of Representatives will do about it, if anything. This is certainly a violation of the rules of the House of Representatives, because the gentleman is referring to what has happened in another body, which is expressly prohibited by the rules.

Mr. DENISON. The rules, Mr. Speaker, do not prevent a reference to the proceedings of another body.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield to permit me to cite him to this provision of the rule——

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will pardon the Chair for a moment, it seems to the Chair that so far this proceeding has been quite irregular.

The attention of the House has not been called to any specific thing upon which to base a question of privilege of the House. Of course, the gentleman may propound a parliamentary inquiry any time he sees fit; but if we are proceeding now on a question of the privilege of the House, the Chair thinks his attention should be called to a specific subject and that the remedy should be offered at the same time.

It is almost the invariable custom in the House, where a question of privilege of the House is raised, to proceed by resolution.

Mr. DENISON. I do not want to take any action that is not in accordance with the rules of the House, but I want to submit this inquiry: Whether the privileges of the House are involved in any infraction of the rule which I have just read by the other body.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that if a question is raised affecting the dignity of the House of Representatives or the question of comity and amity between the two bodies, it would be proper——

Mr. DENISON. That was my view, Mr. Speaker, and in order to present the matter to the House I wanted to read some extracts from last Saturday's RECORD without comment. I think they violate this rule of proper parliamentary procedure both of the House and of the Senate, and I was going to submit the matter as a parliamentary inquiry to the Speaker, and after doing so to further inquire as to what remedy the House had and what the proceedings should be.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the House may at any time, when in its opinion the Senate has violated or reflected on the dignity of the House or brought up questions that would affect the comity between the Houses, it would be in order to offer a resolution respectfully calling the attention of the Senate to the matter to which it took exception.

Mr. DENISON. It was my intention to call the attention of the House to these passages in the RECORD which I thought involved the privileges of the House and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Rules with instructions to advise the House whether the rule had been violated.

Mr. DYER. There is nothing to refer to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, in order that we may proceed in an orderly manner, I make the point of order that there is nothing before the House on which to base the motion that the gentleman desires to refer to the Rules Committee. Let him introduce a resolution, for there is nothing before the House at the present time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would be in order to refer such a resolution to the Committee on Rules, but would doubt the propriety of such a course in instances like these. The Chair thinks that would go further in destroying amity between the Houses. The Chair thinks the only thing the House could do, if in its opinion certain things said in another body reflected on the dignity of the House and threatened to destroy friendly feeling between the two bodies, would be to send a resolution to the other body calling attention to that fact, and nothing more; then the other body could take such action as it saw fit.

Mr. GARNER. Until that resolution is offered I make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman's position is correct.

Mr. DENISON. May I inquire if it is proper to call the attention of the House to certain passages in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD which I think have violated the rule?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman can not call the attention of the House to such matters unless they are based on a resolution. Then it would be for the House to decide whether it desired to call the attention of the Senate to those remarks or not.

Mr. DENISON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I want to propound another parliamentary inquiry. Let me say, preliminary to my inquiry, that I think it is of supreme importance that Members of both Chambers ought to see to it that this fundamental rule against criticism of the proceedings of either House or of its Members by the Members of the other is respected and enforced. This is not a partisan question, and I regret that the leader on the other side [Mr. GARNER] is not willing to let me present the matter to the House. Of course, if there is objection, I do not want to do so.

I desire to present this parliamentary inquiry: Does the rule to which I have been referring make it improper to criticize in either Chamber the conferees that are appointed by the other Chamber on account of what they say or do in the performance of their duty as conferees? When conferees are appointed to manage the conference on the part of the respective Chambers, they are usually appointed at the request of the other Chamber and are performing the duties of their respective Chambers. They are representing their respective Chambers. If it is improper to criticize in one Chamber the actions or the words of Members of the other Chamber, I propose the inquiry to the Speaker whether or not that rule would apply to the actions and the words of the representatives of the Chambers when they are engaged in their business in the conference for which the two Houses have appointed them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that if reference be made to the proceedings of conferees on the part of another House which tend to reflect upon them, such reference would not be in order, but the mere discussion of the proceedings the Chair thinks would be in order.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, under the guise of a parliamentary inquiry the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] has undertaken to violate the rules of the House of Representatives, because he is going to refer to something that happened in another body. I insist that that is contrary to the rule.

The SPEAKER. So far the Chair thinks that the gentleman has only been inquiring as to his own rights.

Mr. GARNER. And he is now proposing to read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD something that occurred in the other body.

Mr. DENISON. I am not proposing to do anything of the kind. I am merely propounding a parliamentary inquiry. As I understand it, then, Mr. Speaker, this rule which makes it improper, for instance, for Members of this House in debate to refer to the proceedings of the Senate, or to language spoken by a Member of the Senate in the Senate, and to in any way criticize either the other body or its Members for their proceedings, would make it improper for Members of this Chamber to criticize the actions of the conferees of the other Chamber when engaged in the performance of their duties in conference. Am I right about that, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. RANKIN. That would not necessarily follow.

Mr. DENISON. I respectfully suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi that I am addressing my inquiry to the Speaker.

Mr. RANKIN. And I stand upon the same footing that the gentleman does, and I shall address the Speaker also and say that that would not necessarily follow. We have had the question up here where one Member of the House went out to the country and made a speech criticizing Members of the other body. That question has been threshed out here, and it is an entirely different proposition where they criticize the action of conferees and where they criticize Members of the other body acting as such.

The SPEAKER. Of course, the trouble the Chair finds himself in is upon the question whether such criticism was made. Generally speaking, all the Chair can say, until his attention is called to some specific instance, is that it is not proper for Members of either House to criticize Members of the other House, either on the floor or as members of a conference committee. Before ruling any further on the question the Chair thinks the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] ought to introduce a resolution and call attention to the remarks of which he complains, and it will then be for the House to decide whether or not those remarks invade the rule of comity between the two Houses; and if so, the House may then send a resolution to the Senate respectfully calling the attention of the Senate to that fact.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I shall be very glad to do so if on further consideration I think the rule would apply to the remarks in question. I was uncertain whether or not the preparation of a resolution of that kind would itself violate this rule, and therefore, as I stated in the beginning, I propounded the parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. On the contrary, the Chair thinks that the introduction of a resolution calling the attention of the other body to certain things would not violate the rules of the House, but the Chair himself has not the slightest idea of what the gentleman is referring to, and it is impossible, therefore, for the Chair to say whether it would or would not be proper to set it forth.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I hope the Members will read the proceedings in the other body, as reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of last Saturday, because I think some Member ought to present to the House a resolution such as has been suggested. I think this rule has been violated by certain references not only to the House but to the House leaders and to the conferees on the part of the House; and I think, if it should be called to the attention of the other Chamber, that in a generous spirit of fairness to the Members of this Chamber and its conferees, as well as in a spirit of proper respect for this very important old fundamental rule of parliamentary procedure, it would be corrected.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Do I understand from what the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] said, that the rule that applies in the House itself also applies to such remarks as a Member may make outside of the House.

The SPEAKER. Oh, not at all.

Mr. RANKIN. It is quite the contrary.

ADDRESS OF HON. JOHN J. DAVIS, SECRETARY OF LABOR

Mr. MENGES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a speech delivered by the Hon. James J. Davis at Gettysburg on the 30th day of May last.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The address is as follows:

MEMORIAL DAY ADDRESS

It is with a feeling of deep emotion that I stand here to-day in this Memorial Cemetery at Gettysburg. I was very much impressed in listening to the ritualistic services conducted by those few remaining survivors of the Grand Army of the Republic over the graves of their comrades. Following that came a wave of young boys and girls strewing flowers as they wended their way around the graves of our brave soldiers who died on this field. It is a picture that touched me deeply and it is a picture that no artist could paint. It is an assurance that the future of our country is safe when men are willing to die for a principle and those who come after them are eager to honor their memory and perpetuate the Nation for which they so nobly gave their lives.

As I stand here to-day on this field, sacred to the cause of human liberty, amidst these graves which bear mute witness to the terrible baptism of fire that descended nearly 6 and 60 years ago in a veritable hurricane of shot and shell upon men as brave and noble as any recorded in history, I can almost fancy that I hear the words spoken here so long ago by our martyred President bidding us to dedicate ourselves to the duty of carrying on the work for which our heroes died, "That this Nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom, and that the government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth."

Yet while we pay due tribute to these heroic dead and take new inspiration from their "last full measure of devotion," let us not forget the living who also risked death on this field and fought the battle to victory. To those of you who stood here with musket in hand 66 years ago, what exalted feelings must come over you to-day as you see in your mind's eye the living picture of conflict and then look about you over the great country that has risen since that day when you fought to save it. To you who survived this battle we owe as great a debt as to those who perished here. Let us take the full measure of that debt and give you the full measure of our gratitude.

This is the first time, I believe, that one who represents labor in the Cabinet of a President of the United States has been called upon to speak on this spot which represents some of the holiest ground in the country. So my first thought is: What part had labor in this historic battle, and what did that battle accomplish for labor?

Labor more than played its full part at Gettysburg. The great majority of the men who fought on this field came from the ranks of the gainfully employed—from the farm, the mine, the mill, the shop, factory, and countinghouse. And what this field accomplished was to set all labor free, and with that free labor to create the greatest nation on the face of the globe, with the greatest machinery for the production of wealth that has ever been assembled.

While the Civil War still waged a great President of the United States stood here to dedicate this field as a perpetual memorial to its heroes. With the outcome of the war still in doubt, President Lincoln used that day of dedication to counsel us, in words as solemn as have ever been spoken, that we carry on to give our country a new birth of freedom. I think we may say to-day, more than 60 years afterward, that those who fought here and died here did win for this country a new birth of freedom. They did settle once and for all whether these United States should remain a union and whether human slavery should exist no more.

Indeed, as we look back over the past, we see that this battle settled more than was thought. We see now that the political and social issues then at stake were not the only issues subject to the fiery test of war. Behind the political questions then fought out was a great economic question. The question was whether in this country labor should be free or shackled and bonded. That was the underlying question forever settled here, and settled right, not only for the United States but for the world itself.

A nation may have the noblest of institutions. Politically it may be a model to all mankind. Indeed, no nation can endure unless it truly is politically sound. But neither can any nation live without labor. Without the fruits of toil it will perish. Without millions of honest workers to meet its material wants and provide comforts and happiness for all, the political virtues of a country can be only a skeleton without a body.

It is important that we have our democratic government and our equal rights to all, but it is also important that our people shall have their work, and by that work shall live their happy lives, shall have their homes, shall rear their families. The citizen must think of his government, but he must also think of his right to a livelihood. That right lies at the very basis of human existence. And it was that right to freedom of work, as much as any other issue, which was settled here on this historic field.

It seems to me appropriate, therefore, that a spokesman for labor should be heard on this holy ground. In a sense this battle was fought for the betterment of labor. The men who died here freed 3,000,000 slaves, whose descendants now number more than 10,000,000 free people. But the slavery that here was wiped from the face of the earth was not a bodily slavery only. Since this battle we have stripped away much slavery of the mind, and we shall go on to strip away more. I can not see how any American can fail to be inspired by the great advances that have already grown from the liberalizing forces set free here a generation or two ago.

It has been our habit, when Lincoln's address is read, to feel abashed before its solemnity, as if we were penitent children who had slipped away from the behests of that great and wise man. Let us read his words for once with rejoicing. I believe these dead about us have not died in vain. I believe this country has had a new birth of freedom. I believe we have dedicated ourselves to carry on the cause that was here so nobly fought for.

It seems to me time that we take a new view of the fruits that have sprung in such abundance from the sacrifices made here, fearful as they were. We have thought only of the political and social blessings secured to us on this field. Now we have a right and a duty to sum up, at last, the other great blessings risen from the men who fought here and fell.

In a little more than a year after this decisive turning point in a bloody war, our country settled back into peace and to peace-time labors. Look about you and see what these labors have brought us.

The miners and the mill hands, the farmers and the shop clerks who fought here helped to free new generations of workers from bondage to poverty. They bound together a political Union in which material opportunity and the freedom to use it became more abundant than ever before. Surely the Nation did experience here a new birth of freedom and of a new kind of freedom. It is the freedom to enjoy a richer and fuller life than any people in history have so far been privileged to live. To-day the same type of factory hand who fought here may rise and become the head of a great business organization, enriching us all with new comforts in life and paying thousands of workers the wages to enable them to enjoy those comforts. Surely that is freedom. The man who yesterday struggled and labored in obscurity may become a great scientist, opening new treasures of nature to the enjoyment and benefit of mankind. Surely that is freedom. The boy born to early poverty and hard work may still rise to be an honored public servant of the people, even in the highest office at their disposal. That also is freedom.

The man who has risen among us from the humblest beginnings to the highest honors is not asked what are his religious beliefs, to what trade organization does he belong, or what are his racial origins. Nothing is asked of him but that he shall have those qualifications of brains and heart that entitle him to our confidence and to the responsibility that we repose in him. Surely that is freedom of a kind such that no one who died to bring us this gift can be said to have died in vain. Every worker in this country lives a richer, fuller life because these workers fought for the preservation of this land of opportunity.

I believe if the sons of toil who lie here sleeping could rise and see what the land they died to save has become they would rejoice at what has been done. But all the more reason have we who benefited so much by these self-giving patriots to come here in reverence and thank them with all our hearts. It is especially becoming for us of the State of Pennsylvania to do so. This tragic battle was fought in the very heart of Pennsylvania. Thousands of those in the battle were sons of Pennsylvania, fighting for her soil. Never shall their glory perish. We can not find words too solemn, too beautiful for their deeds. As one of the most eloquent voices that American has ever heard—the voice of a man who stood under fire on this very field—has said:

"These heroes are dead. They died for liberty; they died for us. They are at rest. They sleep in the land they made free, under the flag they rendered stainless, under the solemn pines, the sad hemlocks, the tearful willows, the embracing vines. They sleep beneath the shadows of the clouds, careless alike of sunshine or storm, each in the windowless palace of his rest. Earth may run red with other wars—they are at peace. In the midst of battles, in the roar of conflict, they found the serenity of death."

Of those who escaped the deadly missiles here only a handful are left, crowned with whitened locks and stooped in gait. But their laurels are bright as ever on their brows, and though their backs be bent, they stand before us with spirit straight and proud. But I believe if Abraham Lincoln could stand here again in this new day in which we live he would utter a new call to still a new dedication.

What really happened on this battle field 66 years ago was an economic clash. It was the conflict of a new economic area, brushing an older one aside. Men may not have known then what moved them. These new economic stirrings were like a wind, moving us without our knowing. These invisible forces are moving us to-day. We are always in the situation of watching a new era brushing out of existence an era that is old and outworn. Every day is a Gettysburg where that battle occurs. It is going on in the field of politics, in legislation. It is going on in business and industry. It is going on within our own minds. So I believe that if Lincoln could stand here to-day he would call us to a new dedication in this endless battle to be rid of old slaveries of thought and prejudice and to unite ourselves for new births of economic freedom.

After the Civil War our country went back to labor in the belief that every doubtful issue had been wisely settled once and for all. Yet in how short a time this supposedly new order had become an old one! Hardly was this Civil War concluded in peace when we fought one economic battle after the other. They were fought because we had come to a sense that a new order was due and that an old one should pass. The old order was the system of poor payment or long and hard hours for the man who toils. That is always an old order, to be outlawed as soon as possible. Yet sometimes it passes only after a struggle.

Not 10 years after the last gun had been fired in the Civil War a small economic war was fought farther north in this very State. It centered about the railroads and the steel mills, where American workers felt that a new order of rewards for their toil should come. They felt they had been slaves to poverty, and they strove for freedom. Our industrial history of that period is dotted with battles over that issue. As we look back on those troubled times we see now that the struggles of that period were as needless as the great fratricidal conflict of the Civil War. In these days of a riper experience and a cooler judgment we can look back on the Civil War and realize that reason and sober sense, if we had waited to call them into play, might have freed the slaves and kept this country whole, without the terrific cost that was paid in human life and blood. So also, we see that the same sober sense might have achieved the same results in dismissing that outworn industrial order of the seventies.

Standing here to-day, we must dedicate ourselves to peaceful abolishment of the last slavery left among us—slavery to poverty, slavery to ignorance, the slavery of intolerance. I believe that Abraham Lincoln would be especially the champion of the worker—the laboring man. I believe it was of the laboring man he was thinking when he said, "God must love them because He has created so many of them." I believe Lincoln would say, "It is well that we have these perfected political institutions, but those who live under them must be enabled to live fuller and happy lives, with the proper rewards for the toil."

Since Gettysburg was fought we have indeed made great strides toward this new freedom of opportunity, this better level of rewards for toil. The laboring man of America enjoys a life unknown to the laborer of the day of Gettysburg. But I believe we must make him even more secure in his present position. I believe Lincoln would be the first to see some of the forces that tend to endanger this position of our workers.

For one thing, we are living just now in a time when science and invention, ever seeking to lessen and save human labor, tend to throw many workers out of their old occupations and send them sometimes on a long search for new ones, with poverty ever ready to render them its slaves for a while. I believe that is one thing we must regard as an old order, to be replaced by a new and better order as soon as we can.

In that one thing alone we need a new order, such that those who employ human workers must think of their fate before installing the new mechanical slaves that will displace them. And as old wrongs always disappear in time, though sometimes not without a struggle, so I believe we shall see this one vanish. But it is an example of the new causes to which I believe we must dedicate ourselves.

While the new era of life which these warriors of Gettysburg ushered in for us so richly and amply justifies the struggle it cost, and while the American people now live this abundant life of to-day, yet nevertheless too many of our people are still insufficiently paid for their toil. Too many of us are still enslaved to a life lacking many of the things that make life worth the living. We must dedicate ourselves to an emancipation of these last remaining slaves to poverty.

We allow ourselves to be guilty, too, of grave injustices even to the best of our workers. I mean those who are dropped from employment merely because they have reached a certain age—50 years, sometimes even 40. This is scarcely the place to go into the reasons why this habit prevails among so many of our employers of labor, but only too many of the skilled and faithful in the great army of labor can testify that the practice of arbitrary discharge for age does prevail among us.

That is slavery to a mistaken principle, slavery to ignorance of plain fact. The laborer at 50 may only have come into his ripest skill, judgment, and experience. His character is settled. He has learned to love his work. All this should make him only the more valuable, the man above all others to be retained at his task and guaranteed his proper payment. Not to regard him in this light means belonging to an old order, which must pass and will pass.

These, my friends, are some of the quiet battles against ignorance and unreason that we must wage in this time of peace. We need to carry into these bloodless struggles of the working world the same heroism and inspiration so freely poured forth by those who fought on this field of Gettysburg. The battle between the right way and the wrong never ceases. Let us be sure that we fight it with the same clear vision, the same unsparing courage, that made history here on the tragic occasion we commemorate to-day. Let us see to it that every day of our lives this country of ours shall have some new birth of freedom—freedom to prosper, freedom to be happy, freedom to know what a great adventure of goodness and charity this life can be made. Let us see to it, above all, that this country remains one great community of equals, equals before the law.

No man in this land should be made to blush for any honest service he gives:

> "All service ranks the same with God
> With God, whose puppets, best and worst,
> Are we; there is no last nor first."

That was the thought in every heart when the plain people whom Lincoln called to action shouldered their muskets and died for a principle. Here on this field of heroic struggle and sacrifice they mingled—the men of every walk of life, from every race. I am proud to pay tribute to those of my people who came here ahead of me and who now lie sleeping on this field. They, too, made the sacrifice necessary to make this country the happy and fortunate field of unlimited opportunity which it has become.

I hope the time has come when great issues will no longer need to be settled on fields of battle. The battles of the future must be battles of the intellect, between reason and unreason. Above all, we must strive for a golden age for labor, for peace and prosperity for employer and employee. It is labor that produces the bulk of the wealth of the world, and there still are workers among us too poorly paid to be at home in a prosperous land. This must not be in a country whose wealth totals up to the staggering figure of $400,000,000,000. These dead of Gettysburg never died for such things as that.

All the history that is inspiring, all the history that we love to read and remember, is the story of how brave men won freedom from some tyrant. And I believe the history of the future will be the story of how labor achieved its final freedom from the tyrants of fear and want, of defeated ambition. I believe the lesson of Gettysburg points in this direction.

ADDRESS OF GEN. HUGH L. SCOTT, RETIRED

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein an address delivered by Maj. Gen. Hugh L. Scott, one of the present Indian commissioners. It has to do with the historic relation of the American Indians to the United States Government.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address by Maj. Gen. Hugh L. Scott, United States Army, retired, a member of the Board of Indian Commissioners, broadcast for the National League of Women Voters May 28, 1929, over WEAF, New York City.

The address is as follows:

HISTORICAL RELATIONS OF THE AMERICAN INDIANS WITH THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT

My friends, I have been asked to speak to you a few moments about the historical relations of our Indians with the Government. This is a large subject and can not be fully treated in a few minutes.

The act of Congress of August 7, 1789, created our War Department, and among other duties assigned to it were those pertaining to Indian affairs, which remained under the jurisdiction of the United States Army until the act of March 3, 1849, created the Department of the Interior and assigned to it the Indian Bureau, whereupon the affairs of the Indian passed from military to civil control.

The Army and the Indian Service grew up together without being regularly planned—both were added to piecemeal from time to time by acts of Congress, some wise, some less so. Both services were extremely crude and inadequate from the standpoint of to-day and both were the creatures of politics. Each succeeding war improved and purified the Army, but the Indian Service never had a war.

At first the duties of the Indian Service were very simple and related mainly to the regulation of trade and intercourse in the Indian country and with the payment of annuities as compensation for land acquired from the Indians by treaty. Many of these treaties were fraudulent in every way because the Indian was ignorant of our laws and customs, unable to protect himself, as he still is, and he was not protected by his guardian, the Government. Gov. William Clark, for instance, purchased in 1819 all the land from the mouth of the Arkansas River to the Rocky Mountains, occupied by many tribes, for about $2,000 from the Quapaw Tribe, who did not own it, and our Court of Claims has not finished even yet settling with the heirs of the real owners.

Many Indian wars were brought on by the encroachments of white settlers on the lands of the Indian and by the results of the purchase by the Government of land owned by the tribe through negotiations with a few individual Indians without consent of the tribe. Reprisals would follow and the Army would be called upon by the political powers to enforce acceptance by the tribe and remove the Indian from the lands of his forefathers.

The Indians were self-supporting when first known and until the game was destroyed by the white man and the livelihood of the Indian thus taken from him. The fur companies, intrenched in political power in Washington, did much as they pleased in the Indian country, they did most of the management that was done and the morals, education, health, and welfare of the Indians received but scant attention from anybody. Whisky, smallpox, measles, and other scourges unknown to the Indian were introduced into his country and carried off many thousands of individuals and weakened whole tribes. The smallpox epidemic of 1837 was said to have been taken to the Upper Missouri on the boat of the American Fur Co., and allowed to reach the Indians by the utmost carelessness. It was reported to have caused the death of 60,000 Indians and the reduction of the Mandan Tribe to 19 families.

A single agent with headquarters at St. Louis would be appointed over five or six wild tribes, most of whom he never saw. He would take the tribal annuities up the Missouri River in the spring on the boat of the American Fur Co., issue them to the Indians at their nearest fur trading station, if they were there to receive them, otherwise throw them off without proper supervision to prevent later the selling to the Indian of his own goods. This done, the agent would return to St. Louis on the same boat, not to be seen again on the upper river for another year. These conditions continued until after the Civil War with slight improvement, and were little better when I first went to the Indian country in 1876.

The American people expected but little from the Indian Service then and got less. It was honeycombed with graft; its employees were political appointees, isolated, looked down upon, trusted by nobody, and generally despised until they were placed under civil-service rules in the time of President Cleveland, when this misprision generally disappeared. It should be obvious that such a service required but slight appropriations for its maintenance, and most of this money was absorbed in the payment of the tribal annuities.

The first great step in education was brought about by the efforts of Capt. R. H. Pratt, Tenth Cavalry, who started a school for the children of Indian prisoners of war at the military post of Carlisle Barracks, Pa., in 1879. The results of this movement awoke the conscience of the American people to their responsibility for the education of the Indian child. Since those days the great nonreservation schools of Sherman, Haskell, Chilocco, Albuquerque, Phoenix, Chemawa, etc., were slowly established, with boarding schools on the different reservations, and now Indian children attend the public schools of their district wherever possible.

Conditions have improved everywhere during the past 20 years, and more especially during the latter 8. Railways have approached the agencies, many comfortable quarters have been erected with modern conveniences, a health service is growing, with establishment of many hospitals. The American people are interesting themselves more and more in the welfare of the Indian and have enormously increased their demands for betterment. The attempted passage of the Bursum bill that got through the Senate brought out a storm of indignation from the Atlantic to the Pacific, with the formation of new societies for the defense of the Indian from spoliation. Congress is much better acquainted now with conditions and more sensitive to the demands of the people for betterment, and the appropriations have increased year by year until now, when they are higher than at any time in our history.

Notwithstanding all this, they are still inadequate. Ex-Secretary of the Interior Work reported last year that the Indian Service was "starved," as indeed it always has been. The tenure of office and pay are insecure, its employees discouraged, and the whole service is under par. Its operative system is antiquated, costly, inefficient, and unduly affected by politics. It needs reorganization, not with new people, for the vast majority are under the civil-service rules, but more efficient and of far higher quality and character than we have any right to expect under the present conditions of isolation, insecurity, discouragement, with overwork and underpay, undue political interference, and improper operative system. I must take off my hat to many of those men and women of the far places. I rejoice in the fidelity of their work under stress, and am vastly proud of their friendship.

There are forces of evil, both white and red, working to abolish the Indian Service and spoliate the Indian. This abolishment would be like throwing a baby to the wolves. The Indian will require the educating and protecting influences of the Indian Service for at least another generation before he will be able to take care of himself. But this service needs the thorough reorganization from within itself without the upheaval which was experienced by the Army after the Spanish War—a slow deliberative reorganization by its own people that gave the Regular Army the proper administrative system which enabled it to digest and take care of the millions of new, untaught men thrust into its organization suddenly by the Great War; to feed, clothe, pay, equip, train, and transport 2,000,000 men to France, place them in their proper positions at the right moments with the will to win; who by their sacrifices and achievements had much to do with the accomplishment of victory and the placing of our country in the forefront of all the nations of the earth.

Before the war this achievement was considered impossible by all the foreign nations who limited our ability to placing 300,000 men in France, and it would have been impossible if Germany had not been held by France and England while we were in preparation. Even then it would have been impossible if the Regular Army was then acting under the administrative system which was in vogue before the Spanish War. The Indian Service needs just such a deliberate, steady, reorganization by its own people without upheaval, and the friends of the Indian feel that it is near at hand.

The Indian Service has many functions identical with those of the Army. Both are operated from an office of central control in Washington; the elements are scattered over a wide extent of country. Both are administrative bureaus concerned with health, education, promulgation of orders, research, building, printing, sanitation, inspection, purchase and supply, pay and audit, transportation, etc., and both should have very nearly an identical administrative system, reorganized in the same way on modern business principles which have proved their value.

Ex-Secretary of the Interior Work brought about a most timely and constructive accomplishment in the recent survey of the Indian field service by the Institute for Government Research, which is entirely without governmental supervision.

The report of this survey is called the Meriam report, in honor of its director, Mr. Lewis Meriam. While it contains little that has not been reported by other services year after year, it has brought the facts in concrete form before the people, unaffected by politics or governmental bias. It shows that the demands of the people for betterment have increased enormously and Congress is awakening to conditions.

The Indian Service has struggled manfully to meet those demands, and has met them successfully so far as the lack of funds and a proper operative system have permitted.

Never before in all our history have conditions been so favorable for reform. The President, the Congress, and the people want it. The new Secretary and Assistant Secretary of the Interior and Commissioner of Indian Affairs are all men of highest quality, unconnected with politics, men of high position and achievement in their own communities, of independent means, inspired only by high civic consciousness and a warm desire for the welfare of the Indian. Never before have we had so many elements of Government in line at the same time, and now is the accepted time for action—the zero hour.

Let us all get behind those gentlemen and support them to the uttermost, defend them from the vicious attacks we must expect from those who are out of sympathy with the welfare of the Indian. And we may yet see an Indian Service of which the American people may be justly proud.

THE TARIFF

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes, under the order of the House, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. CLARK] for 30 minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Maryland. Mr. Speaker and ladies and gentlemen: On the 22d of May, while the tariff bill was open for general debate, time was granted by the gentlemen on the Republican side in charge of the bill to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK]. After the expiration of the time granted, the House, at the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], granted unlimited time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. At the expiration of his time, to my utter surprise, practically the whole House arose in approval. I have interpreted that demonstration as a proper respect for the able gentleman rather than an approval of what he said. What he did was to challenge the constitutionality and wisdom of the flexible tariff section of the Hawley tariff bill then being considered.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the flexible tariff, and in doing so I support a most wholesome and established policy not only of the Federal Government but of every State in the Union; that is, the policy of administrative application of law to changing facts, upon which said law depends. Very early in our history this policy was adopted as a legislative necessity. It has been challenged and defended in a hundred cases.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] a few days ago sought to discredit this policy, as it is proposed to apply it to the Hawley-Smoot bill of 1929. He says this policy in this bill is carried too far; that it is not within the facts, and therefore not within the ruling of the Hampton case of 1928, reported in Two hundred and seventy-sixth United States Reports, construing the flexible provision of the 1922 law, or the Field case, reported in One hundred and forty-third United States Reports, construing countervailing-duty provisions of the McKinley law of 1890, or any other case on record. He says the bill of 1929 enlarges the President's power of revision by making theories instead of facts the basis of changes or tariff revision. From this he draws his conclusion that the alleged extension of power delegated to the President in this bill is a delegation of legislative or taxing power. At the conclusion of his speech I asked for time the next day to answer it, but the bill was not thereafter open for further general debate.

In replying now to the distinguished gentleman [Mr. BECK], it is necessary first to look at the 1922 law and the court's interpretation of it, and then compare it with the corresponding section of the Hawley bill of 1929, which he criticizes as representing an unwarranted extension or enlargement of the flexible provisions of the 1922 law.

What are the differences in the flexible provisions of these two statutes, 1922 and 1929?

1922 says presidential revision up or down must follow differences in costs of production at home and abroad, and so forth.

1929 says such revision must follow variations or differences in competitive conditions of domestic and foreign products laid down in the principal domestic markets, and so forth.

Difference in competitive conditions is the real basis of revision and the real object and purpose of investigation.

Cost of production is laid down as the general rule of revision in 1922 law, and then treated as only one element of the conditions justifying revision.

I understand this defect in stating an element of the thing to be found rather than the thing itself, needed correction, and the proposed language in the 1929 law is perfecting in substance.

Is there change of policy? There is no change of policy, only change of expression. The law providing for ascertainment of differences in costs is about the same as that which directs the finding of differences in competitive conditions, as shown by a parallel reading of the requirements for finding their competitive difference or equalizing figure.

Subsection (c) of section 315 provides—

That in ascertaining the differences in costs of production, under the subdivisions (a) and (b) of this section, the President, in so far as he finds it practicable, shall take into consideration (1) the differences in conditions in production, including wages, costs of material, and other items in costs of production of such or similar articles in the United States and in competing foreign countries; (2) the differences in the wholesale selling prices of domestic and foreign articles in the principal markets of the United States; (3) advantages granted to a foreign producer by a foreign government, or by a person, partnership, corporation, or association in a foreign country; (4) any other advantages or disadvantages in competition.

Act of 1929, section 336, subsection (d):

ASCERTAINMENT OF DIFFERENCES IN CONDITIONS OF COMPETITION

In ascertaining the differences in conditions of competition between domestic articles and like or similar competitive imported articles in the principal market of the United States the President shall take into consideration, in so far as he finds it practicable and applicable; (1) costs of production of the domestic article or the price at which such article is freely offered for sale to all purchasers in the principal market of the United States in the ordinary course of trade and in the usual wholesale quantities in such market; (2) costs of production of the imported article or the price or value set forth in its invoice, or its import cost as defined in subdivision (e) of section 332; (3) other costs of the domestic article and of the imported article in so far as not considered under paragraphs (1) or (2), including (a) the cost of all containers and covering of whatever nature and other charges and expenses incident to placing the article in condition packed ready for delivery, and (b) costs of transportation; and (4) advantages granted to a foreign producer by a government, person, partnership, corporation, or association in a foreign country.

Thus in the act of 1922 changes of established duties may be made by Executive order to equalize differences in production costs at home and abroad.

In the pending bill such changes may be made by Executive order to equalize differences in conditions of competition between domestic and imported articles in the principal market of the United States.

Now, we all know, gentlemen, that there was no mention made of this change in the report of the committee which accompanied the bill, and the one and only purpose of this change was to clarify the language.

Mr. BECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Maryland. Yes.

Mr. BECK. I think if the gentleman will look at the report of the Committee on Ways and Means he will ascertain that they did refer to it and recommended the change on the ground that the costs of production could not be ascertained.

Mr. CLARK of Maryland. I am very thankful to the gentleman for that correction. I looked for it but did not see it; but what the gentleman says simply confirms what I have already said. In the 1922 flexible sections there is laid down the rule of the differences in the costs of production in making Executive revisions. That rule was circumvented by importers, and it was hard to understand by those who had to apply the rules. It developed very soon in the application of those rules that really what was necessary to be determined in fixing an equalizing duty was not the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, but the difference in competitive conditions; that the cost of production was only one element of the main thing that had to be determined, and that gave a lot of trouble and made it necessary for the committee to lay down the true fact for determination, namely, the differences in competitive conditions; and you will see that in the rules laid down for the President to follow in arriving at that determination he must take into consideration the differences in the costs of production at home and abroad.

The conclusion, therefore, can not be escaped that no real differences appear except to make the language of the act more conformable to the facts to be investigated and to make effective the equalizing or competitive policy of the bill. I can not see where the President's power is any greater under the 1929 proposal than in the 1922 act. The provision "Any other advantages or disadvantages in competition" in the 1922 act is broad enough to let in every study of competitive conditions mentioned or contemplated in the present or proposed bill. The purpose in both acts is administrative application of the competitive policy in the law to changing facts upon which this law depends. Under the Hawley law foreign circumlocution can no longer defeat investigations and reports within the policy.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, this change of phraseology between the two acts is made not with a view of changing the fact-finding policy to a theory or rainbow-chasing policy, as has been intimated, but to clarify and emphasize the doctrine of equalization of competitive conditions underlying the entire bill. This policy was prompted by necessity and will be retained as an evolution in orderly and effective legislative procedure.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Maryland. Yes.

Mr. BRUMM. Does not the levying of all taxes depend upon changing conditions from year to year? All taxes of every kind depend upon changing conditions, and, that being so, would the gentleman say that the President could be authorized to levy taxes according to the changing of conditions from year to year?

Mr. CLARK of Maryland. I am stating a principle that you will find back in our law from the very beginning, and I refer you to the Brig Aurora case in Seventh Cranch, which involves practically the same principle, and the Marshall Field case, in One hundred and forty-third United States Reports, a countervailing duty case, involving the construction of the McKinley Reciprocity Act of 1890.

Mr. BRUMM. But the gentleman has not answered. Does not the levying of taxes depend upon changing conditions constantly?

Mr. CLARK of Maryland. Not in the sense, if the gentleman pleases, that the law of Congress is applied to changing conditions in this matter. I do not mean, nor does Congress mean, that it is possible for the President to follow all changes in facts and to make a duty that will equalize every difference that might arise from time to time. What is attempted here is to have this matter, which needs attention at all times, taken care of in the most logical and the most common-sense way.

Do we want this matter of tariff revision brought back into this House every year?

Mr. BRUMM. Yes; if necessary.

Mr. BECK. Will the gentleman further yield?

Mr. CLARK of Maryland. I will.

Mr. BECK. If Congress passed a law to equalize conditions of competition between those who have property and those who have not, would the gentleman regard a law that gave the President of the United States the power to impose income taxes at pleasure to equalize such competition a delegation of legislative power?

Mr. CLARK of Maryland. I do not regard that, if the gentleman pleases, as an analogous case at all. I am here discussing the question of import duties based upon the competitive theory and take the position that if we want to make our law, which is supposed to involve the policy of protection, effective, we have to lodge in some governmental agency the power to apply the policy to changing conditions, especially so since the World War when economic conditions have been disturbed almost to the point of business revolution, and overnight the very conditions upon which a duty is laid might be changed.

The gentleman concedes that if the facts were ascertainable and tangible, the powers granted would be fact-finding powers, but says that when facts are not definitely ascertainable, such as differences in conditions of competition, then discretion and judgment must be exercised, and that in that instance the powers delegated and exercised are legislative.

The same argument was urged in the Hampton case and it was thrown out the window headlong. Such differences can never be fixed with exactness and it is not expected, but the policy is clear and definite and the plan is sensible and sound.

When the law and common sense are in apparent conflict the conflict is compromised or corrected on the side of common sense. Nearest proximity to fact and not 100 per cent exactness is the rule in sensible law making.

Now, the gentleman drew two conclusions of law from this flexible section of the Hawley Act, and I challenge the defensibility of both.

He says that in this legislation Congress has unconstitutionally and unwisely transferred almost absolute power of legislation to the President.

This criticism contains two independent concepts, to which I call attention:

First. He says there has been a transfer of legislative power.

Second. That this transfer is almost absolute and very portentious.

Anything transferred requires the affirmative act of the transferee to recover it. Congress has no authority to transfer any power granted to it.

It has authority to declare by statute a policy and authorize Executive or administrative adjustments necessary to conform to said policy. It has authority to delegate or commit fact-finding and law-applying power.

Is not this what Congress has done in this case—delegated fact-finding authority only, and then authorized Executive application, and so forth?

Now, why has Congress done this? Was it to avoid responsibility? Was it in sheer cowardly abrogation of its law-making prerogatives?

Mr. BECK. I will only ask one further question and then I will not trespass further upon the gentleman's time. Will not the gentleman, before he leaves this answer to my question, explain the distinction so far as the question of the transfer of legislative power between the power of the President to impose an income tax and the power of the President to levy a duty upon imports? Wherein is the distinction from the standpoint of the constitutional power of Congress to impose either class of taxes?

Mr. CLARK of Maryland. In answering the gentleman I would say that the case presented is not an analogous case.

Mr. BECK. Yes. The gentleman said that before, but in what respect is it not analogous?

Mr. CLARK of Maryland. It is not analogous because here we are dealing with import duties in which we are attempting to set up equalization figures for protective purposes.

Mr. BECK. I know, but import duties and income taxes are two different kinds of taxes, and the power of taxation is vested in the Congress. Now, in what respect is there any distinction between the two in giving the President the power to impose either?

Mr. CLARK of Maryland. I think a complete answer to the gentleman is the fact that all the way through the statutory law of this country the question of the term "tax" and the term "duty" is distinguished, and we do not refer to tax when we refer to duties.

A little further on in my speech I had intended to draw a distinction between the word "tax" and the word "duty," as used in the Constitution, and that is one of the criticisms I understand that the gentleman from Pennsylvania brings against the flexible provisions of the 1929 bill.

The gentleman does not only say that it is an attempt to delegate legislative power, he says that it is an attempt to transfer taxing power.

Now, in the case of United States v. 49 Demijohns (39 Fed. 402), decided in 1889, the court very carefully went into the history of these two words, duty under the Constitution and tax under the Constitution, and this is what the court said in conclusion:

> In a careful examination of the numerous instances in which the word "tax" is used throughout the entire statutes of the United States, I have failed to find where it can, with any degree of satisfaction, be applied to duties or imports.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania knows and every Member of Congress knows that it was finally adjudged necessary to make the law flexible to meet rapidly changing conditions. When the law is based on a stable set of facts the law can be rigid, but when based on facts that are shifting and changing, the law must have flexibility to make it effective and serve its purpose.

But the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] says, let Congress take care of flexibility. If competitive conditions change, let Congress change the law after determination of the facts, and so forth. Who wants to throw this fact-finding matter back into Congress?

From the beginning of our legislative history, Congress has applied this identical policy when necessity required it, or wisdom dictated it.

As said in the case of Buttfield v. Stranahan (192 U. S.), at page 496, arising under the tea standards act of 1897 involving the same policy:

> Congress legislated on the subject as far as was reasonably practicable, and from the necessities of the case was compelled to leave to executive officials the duty of bringing about the result pointed out by the statute. To deny the power of Congress to delegate such a duty, would, in effect, amount to declaring the plenary power vested in Congress to regulate foreign commerce could not be efficaciously exerted.

It should not be necessary to go back of the Hampton case, 1928 (276 U. S. 394), which directly validates the 1922 law on this point. The court said in part:

> The field of Congress involves all and many varieties of legislative action, and Congress has found it frequently necessary to use officers of the executive branch, within definite limits, to secure the exact effect intended by its acts of legislation, by vesting discretion in such officers to make public regulations interpreting a statute and directing the details of its execution, even to the extent of providing for penalizing a breach of such regulation.
> Congress may feel itself unable conveniently to determine exactly when its exercise of the legislative power should become effective, because dependent on future condition, and it may leave the determination of such time to the decision of an executive, or, as often happens in matters of State legislation, it may be left to a popular vote of the residents of a district to be affected by the legislation. While in a sense one may say that such residents are exercising legislative power, it is not an exact statement, because the power has already been exercised legislatively by the body vested with that power under the constitution, the condition of its legislation going into effect being made dependent by the legislature on the expression of the voters of a certain district. As Judge Ranney, of the Ohio Supreme Court, in Cincinnati, Wilmington & Zanesville Railroad Co. v. Commissioners (1 Ohio St. 77, 88), said in such case:

"The true distinction, therefore, is between the delegation of power to make the law, which necessarily involves a discretion as to what it shall be, and conferring an authority or discretion as to its execution, to be exercised under and in pursuance of the law. The first can not be done; to the latter no valid objection can be made." See also Myers v. Reading (21 Pa. St. 188, 202; Locke's Appeal, 72 Pa. St. 491, 498).

Quoting Judge Mitchell in the case of State v. Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co. (30 Minn. 281), the Supreme Court in this Hampton case further says:

If such power is to be exercised at all, it can only be satisfactorily done by a board or commission constantly in session, whose time is exclusively given to the subject, and who, after investigation of the facts, can fix rates with reference to the peculiar circumstances of each road and each particular kind of business, and who can change or modify these rates to suit the ever-varying conditions of traffic. * * * Our legislature has gone a step further than most others and vested our commission with full power to determine what rates are equal and reasonable in each particular case. Whether this was wise or not is not for us to say; but in doing so we can not see that they have transcended their constitutional authority. They have not delegated to the commission any authority or discretion as to what the law shall be—which would not be allowable—but have merely conferred upon it an authority and discretion, to be exercised in the execution of the law, and under and in pursuance of it, which is entirely permissible. The legislature itself has passed upon the expediency of the law and what it shall be. The commission is intrusted with no authority or discretion upon these questions. (See also the language of Justices Miller and Bradley in the same case in this court. 134 U. S. 418, 459, 461, 464.)

This policy was upheld in the countervailing duty case of Field v. Clark (143 U. S. Repts.) arising under the McKinley Reciprocity Act of 1890; in the commission cases arising under the Interstate Commerce Commission act of 1887 and amendments thereto; in the Brig Aurora case (7 Cranch 382), arising under the nonintercourse act of 1809, and was applied by Congress as early as Washington's administration in 1794, when power was given the President to lay an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports of the United States and suspend said embargo "whenever in his judgment the public safety should require it."

Counsel in the Hampton case, appearing against the flexible provision of the 1922 act, sought to distinguish the above cases as not in point, but the court held that the same principle of administrative application of law to changing facts was involved, and that this principle did not constitute delegation of legislative power. This the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] is willing to concede as the court's interpretation of said act, but criticizes it as the court's pontifical absolution of congressional activities in the delegation of its taxing powers, and then proceeds to condemn the proposed 1929 revision of the flexible provision of said act as a further and constitutionally unwarranted transfer of legislative power.

Now, it was also said that the power delegated to the President was portentious and almost absolute.

Is this true? Did Congress carelessly delegate this power with no limitations? Was nothing done to give the public confidence in the fairness of the President's revisions?

Consider the limitations placed upon the President.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] says that the pending bill gives almost absolute legislative or taxing power to the President. To this it should be sufficient to simply answer that such statement can be only an opinion of the distinguished gentleman, as it is neither a quotation nor even a strained interpretation of any part of the flexible provision section.

The fact is that the law intentionally and expressly puts the responsibility of honest ascertainment of competitive cost conditions in the principal United States markets and the enforcement of this policy upon the President, and then in subsection (e) proceeds to limit these powers to safeguard the public against possible abuse, as follows; listen to this:

1. That no proclamation can be made by the President, i. e., no increase or decrease of duty can be made until a thorough domestic and foreign competitive cost-condition investigation shall have been made by the commission and all differences in competitive conditions ascertained.

2. That the commission shall give public hearings and give reasonable public notice of same.

3. That all parties in interest shall be given reasonable opportunity to be present, to produce evidence, and be heard.

4. That after all this is done, to safeguard the public, and said proceedings have been reported to the President, he may increase or decrease the established duty within the 50 per cent minimum or maximum limit or change the classification, and not until this is done and the amount of duty needed to equalize competitive and cost conditions is determined as provided can the President exercise any duty-changing power under this proposed revision, just as under the 1922 law.

5. The President has no discretion, but is limited to the proclamation of a competitive and equalizing duty, based upon such independent investigation by public authority. This is not a changing of the law by the President but a studied and scientific application of the law.

How, therefore, can the gentleman say that this flexible-tariff section proposes to delegate almost absolute power of taxation to the President?

Now, another major criticism was hurled at this wholesome policy. The gentleman said that this flexible provision was an almost absolute transfer of taxing power.

The Constitution distinguishes between a tax and duty. Loosely, at times tariff duties are referred to as taxes. The proper and restrictive use of the word "duty" all through our statutes and the history of the tariff is that duty refers to tariffs and not to taxes. A tariff duty is not a tax.

In United States v. 49 Demijohns, 1889 (39 Fed. 402), the court went very carefully into the history of these two words in legislation. It concluded, as I have already indicated, by saying:

In a careful examination of the numerous instances in which the word "tax" is used throughout the entire statutes of the United States, I have failed to find one where it can, with any degree of satisfaction, be applied to duties on imports.

There is an additional reason why taxes are not contemplated in this flexible provision. Everyone knows that the whole purpose of this section is for protection through an equalizing or competitive duty. No one has mentioned tax in the whole debate. It was never in the mind of a single Congressman except, apparently, the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The fact is that under the surface of this gentleman's effort is an evident purpose to discredit an established and most wholesome policy, one that has become necessary and indispensable in the evolution of reasonable and orderly legislation. In this effort he has the hearty cooperation of traditional and obstructive Democratic assistance. His entire argument contains nothing new, but is a repetition of Democratic thought and argument on this subject since it first arose early in the history of American legislation.

Now this is the common sense of the whole matter: In the administration of a tariff law it is obvious under shifting world-wide economic conditions that it might become necessary in pursuance of a protective policy to make some ad interim adjustments or revisions, depending upon existence or nonexistence of certain facts. This necessity was accentuated after the war, when things happened quickly, when economic conditions were unsettled and uncertain. Is the authority to find these facts and apply the law as this Congress proposes it a delegation of taxing authority? If any Member of this Congress thinks so, I ask him or her to produce a case of last resort sustaining such contention. This is old legislative practice, and just such speeches as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] has made opposing such practice are just as old. I had hoped that after the Hampton case this policy of administrative application of law to changing facts, after decades of trial and success, had obtained a status of immunity from further Democratic assault and most certainly from responsible Republican assault.

The time has come when Congress can not exercise certain powers intelligently and satisfactorily without the delegation of fact-finding and law-applying authority, and the future will have further delegations of the same character as we progress and business relationships and conditions become more complicated. This policy itself is protective and progressive in character and there is no substantial public opposition to it, and never has been. Whenever abused, it can be easily corrected.

Let me ask you this question: Does the country want railroad rate making thrown back into Congress? The principle is the same. Take the delegation of congressional power to fix railroad rates: The time came when Congress could no longer cope with railroad rate-making requirements. Rate regulation depended upon a complexity of facts pertaining to rates and practices that were shifting and changing with changed conditions. What happened? Congress said we will pass an interstate commerce act establishing the law and create a commission to administer this law. We will, as a part of this law, authorize the commission to determine the facts to which the law applies and fix the rates accordingly. It was originally held by the courts that the commission under said delegation of authority could only declare as unreasonable, rates initiated by the carriers. By the Hepburn amendment of 1906 the commission was given authority to fix maximum rates by applying the law to changed conditions requiring rate revisions. The rates when fixed were adjudged to be tantamount to congressional enactments.

Congress had never delegated this fact-finding authority until it became necessary to protect the rights and interests of the people. This is true of the flexible tariff. The public wanted it and is satisfied with it, and the public is satisfied with the flexible tariff provisions of the pending bill. Congress will always determine its tariff policy and make its tariff laws, but Congress will more and more find it necessary to delegate the finding of facts, upon which the law depends for its successful administration, to executive or administrative agencies.

I hold in my hand a volume of 125 closely typed pages containing the cost of production facts and figures in a presidential investigation case. The subject is tomatoes, only one of thousands. And yet the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] would throw back into this Congress duty adjustments under the flexible provisions providing for the appointment of a commission of four persons to make investigations and report directly to this body for action. The public does not want any such procedure as it would be a backward step. This would involve constant tariff controversies on the floor of Congress, the result of which would be anything but orderly and efficient legislation all along the line.

What would happen if we were to bring into this Congress the complicated western, southern, and eastern freight classifications and thousands upon thousands of class and commodity rates upon our railway systems? We would not know where to start nor how to start in the direct regulation of fixing of such rates. Or suppose we were to provide that the Interstate Commerce Commission should report its findings upon all rate questions to this Congress for direct action. What would be the result? The fact is that it was hoped that the Tariff Commission would have the effect of taking the tariff out of politics entirely and eventually place it, just as railroad rates are now, in the hands of an expert commission for scientific adjustment based on declared congressional policy or law.

Can it now be said that we have delegated lawmaking power to the Interstate Commerce Commission? Have not the commission cases definitely determined this question? Concerning railroad rates, somewhat different, technically speaking, from tariff duties, we have declared the common law and have established the commission with authority to apply this law to changing facts in the establishment of rates that will yield a fair return on a fair value. But that does not alter the fact that every item of law in the Interstate Commerce Commission act and amendments thereto has been declared by Congress. When the rate is ordered by the commission it is tantamount to and becomes a part of the law, not by what the commission has done in the abstract but by the provision of the law itself. The same is true in principle with respect to the flexible provisions of the tariff law, and I am opposed to any departure from this most valuable, wholesome, wise, and necessary policy until and unless it shall be found to be unworkable as a legislative expedient.

I am just as jealous of the integrity of our Constitution as the gentleman from Pennsylvania or any other Member of the House, but whenever it is possible to reconcile the Constitution with common-sense legislation, such as this is, I believe it strengthens the Constitution in the admiration and affection of the people by favoring such reconciliation. [Applause.]

PROHIBITION ENFORCEMENT

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, this morning's press carries an article describing another tragedy which indicates that the prohibition law is creating a citizenry of lawbreakers and murderers instead of law-respecting citizens.

The Associated Press report from International Falls, Minn., appeared in this morning's Washington Post, as follows:

BORDER DRY PATROL SHOOTS MAN DEAD—AUTOIST FAILS TO HALT AT ORDER AND FUSILLADE FOLLOWS; INQUIRY IS BEGUN—TWO CHILDREN IN MACHINE

INTERNATIONAL FALLS, MINN., June 9 (A. P.).—Henry Virkula, 41, Big Falls (Minn.) merchant, was shot and killed while driving home in an automobile with his wife and two children near here last night when he failed to stop at the command of border patrolmen assigned to liquor-smuggling duty.

County police who launched an investigation said there was no evidence of liquor in Virkula's automobile. Two empty bottles were found, but proved to have been medicine containers, police said.

Virkula's wife claimed her husband was shot before he had an opportunity to stop his automobile. She said the machine traveled little more than 10 feet after the command was given, when a fusillade of bullets penetrated the car.

E. J. White, appointed to the border patrol forces a few months ago, admitted firing the shots which killed Virkula. White was accompanied by E. V. Servine, also a newly appointed border-patrol man. Both officers have been temporarily suspended while the shooting is being investigated.

County Attorney David Hurlburt, of Koochiching County, declared charges will be preferred against White if a coroner's inquest, scheduled for to-morrow morning, discloses the shooting was without cause.

Virkula was shot through the neck, and death was instantaneous. The shooting occurred about 11.30 o'clock last night. The body was brought by the patrolmen to this city, where Virkula's aged parents reside. The slain man operated a confectionery at Big Falls.

The shooting was done with sawed-off shotguns. The automobile was dented with shot in about 26 places.

Superior officers of the two patrolmen said that officers have been warned to shoot only in self-defense. A report of the affair has been sent to headquarters at Grand Forks, N. Dak.

White and Servine refused to comment on the shooting.

The two patrolmen's duties consisted chiefly of watching for liquor runners from Canada. The shooting occurred about 15 miles south of the Canadian border. The men make their headquarters at International Falls, on the Canadian border.

I rise at this time to ask that the departments in charge of law enforcement in America make every effort to send these murderers to the penitentiary and thereby broadcast to every part of the Nation that peaceful and law-abiding citizens of our Republic can take an automobile trip with their family without being deliberately murdered by some inefficient law-enforcement officer who believes that the prohibition law is the only law of the land and is paramount to the laws that protect human life and prevent murders. [Applause.]

THE SENATE EXPORT DEBENTURE AMENDMENT EXPLAINED

Mr. HASTINGS. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, the Senate export debenture amendment, in brief, provides that when the Federal farm board created under this farm marketing bill finds it advisable to carry out the policy as declared in section 1 of the bill, the board shall notify the Secretary of the Treasury to issue debentures or certificates to the exporters of agricultural commodities and their manufactured products to the amount of 50 per cent of the tariff on these products. There being no tariff on cotton, the amount of the certificates is fixed at 2 cents per pound, or $10 per bale.

I favor this amendment for two reasons:

First, it is optional with the farm board created by the bill as to whether it will go into effect, and, if the board finds that agricultural products can be stabilized under the other provisions of the bill, then this debenture amendment will not become operative; and it goes into effect only when the board finds it advisable and necessary to put it into effect to assist agriculture. Now, just what possbile harm could that do? It gives the authority to the board to be exercised only when the board finds it necessary to accomplish the purposes as set forth in section 1 of the bill to stabilize agricultural commodities and the products processed and marketed thereunder.

Second, I favor the amendment for the reason, as I have attempted to show at length in a general speech I made on the tariff bill May 21, 1929, that the tariff is ineffective so far as those agricultural products are concerned, of which we regularly raise an exportable surplus. This amendment seeks to make the tariff effective as to those agricultural products.

Now, let us illustrate with wheat, cotton, and corn:

We regularly raise an exportable surplus of each of these products. In the calendar year 1928 we exported of wheat and its products 206,258,610 bushels. There is a tariff of 42 cents per bushel on wheat. We imported last year one-fortieth of 1 per cent of the amount of wheat we produced. The tariff therefore is ineffective as to wheat. This debenture amendment would give the exporters of wheat 50 per cent of the tariff, or 21 cents per bushel. The purchasers for export of wheat and its products would therefore not only pay to the producers of wheat the price which the foreign market justified, but in addition the 21 cents per bushel authorized by the debenture amendment.

As to cotton, we exported in 1928, 8,546,419 bales. The exporters would receive debenture certificates of 2 cents per pound, or $10 per bale, and would, therefore, pay the cotton producers, as they do now, the price which the foreign market justifies and in addition the extra 2 cents per pound.

As to corn, the rate now carried in the pending tariff bill is 25 cents per bushel. We exported last year 25,000,000 bushels of corn. The exporters of corn would fix the price, as they do now, based upon the foreign market and in addition add the amount of the debenture certificate, which would be 12½ cents per bushel.

As to wheat, corn, and cotton, the price would be reflected back, and would increase the amount which the original producer or farmer gets for his products. At present he gets nothing because of the tariff, but he pays higher prices for everything that he buys, and to that extent contributes to the prosperity of the industrialists of the East.

Last year we received the sum of $565,501,000 collected as duties because of the tariff. Those export debenture certificates given to the exporters of agricultural products, including wheat, cotton, and corn, would be receivable at the customhouse at par value. The discount paid for these certificates by importers of other commodities would be very slight, certainly not more than 5 per cent.

Let us illustrate again with these three products. If we exported in round numbers 200,000,000 bushels of wheat and the exporters received certificates for 21 cents per bushel, the exporters in the aggregate would receive $42,000,000 in debenture certificates.

The exporters of cotton, based on the 8,500,000 bales exported, in round numbers, would receive 2 cents per pound, or $10 per bale, or $85,000,000 in debenture certificates.

As to corn, the exporters would receive 12½ cents per bushel, or approximately $3,000,000 upon the approximately 25,000,000 bushels of corn exported last year.

Add the debenture certificates as to each of these three products, and they will approximate $130,000,000; and it is estimated that debenture certificates as to the other products exported may increase this amount to approximately $140,000,000. These certificates will be received and accepted in lieu of money at the customhouse, which would reduce the amount of money received and paid into the Treasury on account of customs duties—which amounted last year to $565,501,000—by the sum of about $140,000,000, or to approximately $425,000,000. This amount will not only benefit the farmers by increasing the foreign price of agricultural products but will raise the domestic price of wheat, corn, and cotton, and the other products consumed, in our own country, because the domestic market will have to meet the foreign market plus the amount of the debenture certificates.

Last year we imported only one-fortieth of 1 per cent of all the wheat grown in this country. We imported only a very small quantity of a special kind of long staple cotton, and about one-fiftieth of 1 per cent of the amount we produced, or a negligible quantity of corn. Hence a tariff or import duty as to these products, as everyone knows, is ineffective. No one who has any respect for his mental integrity now argues in either House that a tariff is effective as to those products of which we regularly raise an exportable surplus.

During campaign years we often hear much talk of how the farmer is to be benefited by the tariff, but the argument is always in general terms and never specific; and how wheat, corn, and cotton are to be benefited is not discussed in detail. Only generalities are indulged in. Every farmer should demand of the speaker just how the producers of cotton, wheat, and corn are to be benefited. Ask him to go into details and you will embarrass him and he will change the subject.

Now this debenture certificate amendment makes the tariff effective as to those farm products of which we regularly raise an exportable surplus, and it is the only way advanced that will do it.

The tariff is effective as to manufactured articles because it raises the tariff wall against competition of foreign manufactured products brought into this country and enables our domestic manufacturers to raise the price to the consumers.

Now, this debenture amendment is an effort to make the tariff effective as to the things which the farmer raises. All Senators from the agricultural States, which are not dominated by large cities, favor the plan because they know that the tariff is not effective as to these farm products otherwise.

It is urged that the tariff makes the manufacturers in the East more prosperous and enables them to consume more farm products. On the other hand, the issuance of debenture certificates will increase the price which the farmer gets for his products and make him more prosperous and will enable him to buy and use more of the manufactured products.

With a moderate tariff there would be no necessity for the issuance of the debenture certificates, but with such an excessive tariff bill as that which recently passed the House and which is now pending in the Senate, raising the rates on practically everything which the consuming public must buy, the debenture certificate amendment will in a small measure tend to equalize the farmers with the industrialists of the East. You call it a subsidy. Well, the tariff is special privilege legislation which enables the manufacturers of the East to force the consuming public to pay a higher price for the goods which they manufacture. This is only rebating back to the farmer a small part you extract from him by special-privilege legislation.

This debenture amendment will enable the farmers to get more for the products they raise, measured by the foreign price plus the debenture certificate, and will advance the price of goods consumed in the domestic market. You can argue around it in every way you choose, but there is no doubt but what the issuance of these debenture certificates will enhance the amount which will be received by the farmers for the products which they raise.

It is urged that the producers will not receive this advanced price. Everyone knows that is not true, because the purchasers for export will pay the price justified by the foreign market, plus the amount of the debenture certificates.

It is urged that this will benefit those who have bought up large quantities of farm products and who are holding them for export. Unfortunately that is true. At the same time, however, it must be remembered that the passing of this tariff bill, raising the duty on manufactured articles, will enable the manufacturers of the East to raise the price on goods already manufactured and held by them.

The National Grange and other organizations composed of more than 800,000 members, have been advocating the export debenture plan for a number of years. There is no question but what it will advance the price of farm products so that the producers will receive more for them. If we are to have a higher tariff on every manufactured product which the consumers of the country must buy, then the debenture certificate is justified in making this tariff effective as to the products produced by the farmers of the country. No other way is proposed to place the producers of agricultural products on an equality with industry. Either lower the excessive tariff duties on the necessaries which the consumers buy or equalize the farmers in the way proposed by this amendment.

CENSUS—REAPPORTIONMENT—ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the conferees on the part of the House on the census and reapportionment bill may have until midnight to-night to file their report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. GARNER. Reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman a question—what is the program for the balance of the week?

Mr. TILSON. To clean up such matters as are left and which we should attend to. Then if nothing else happens, we may enter into some sort of arrangement for 3-day recesses.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman has no hope of anything except the gentleman's agreement in the House for recesses of three days during the summer?

Mr. TILSON. Not so far as has been developed up to this time.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman uses an expression that covers quite a good deal of territory, when he says to consider such things as ought to be considered. I want to say to the gentleman, so that the RECORD will show it and Members can understand it, that as far as my own individual responsibility goes I am not going to give consent for the consideration of bills except those that have had committee consideration. I understand that there are two propositions before the House that have had joint committee consideration. One is completed and they have made a complete and unanimous report. The other has made a partial report upon which some action should probably be had. I am not in sympathy with the legislation, but I do not feel like taking the responsibility of refusing unanimous consent for its consideration, since it is a complete work, authorized by the Seventieth Congress and reported to the Seventy-first Congress. Outside of those two bills I hope the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] will take the responsibility of saying no to those gentlemen who ask for the consideration of other measures.

Mr. HASTINGS. If the minority leader would be a little more specific in reference to these two bills I think the Members on this side of the House would be very grateful.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I shall be very glad to state to the gentleman just what they are. In the Seventieth Congress we organized a Joint Committee on Aviation for the District of Columbia. As I understand it, that committee has partially completed its labors. The President of the United States has sent to the Congress a budget of $500,000 in order to get options on land for an airport. That is a unanimous report, as I understand it. It is an emergency measure, according to the President's statement, and I believe it to be a fact that it will be advisable to pass this bill at this time, because it will save the Government money.

The second proposition is this: A joint committee was created by the Seventieth Congress to readjust the salaries of the employees of Congress. As I understand it, that committee has completed its work and has made a unanimous report. While I am not in sympathy with the latter legislation, I do not feel that I ought to stand in the way of its consideration since it is a completed report, and we might as well consider it one time as another.

Mr. HASTINGS. May I ask the gentleman a further question? Some of us on this side are interested in the resolution to postpone the payment by France of the $400,000,000 on August 1. That was to come up in the House for consideration I think last Wednesday, but for some reason it was not called up. We would like to know whether it is the intention to have that resolution called up for consideration before the recess?

Mr. TILSON. I do not know what the gentleman means by "before the recess."

Mr. HASTINGS. Before this agreement for 3-day recesses. As I understand the colloquy between the majority and the minority leaders there is going to be some agreement for some recessing pretty soon.

Mr. TILSON. So far as the resolution to which the gentleman from Oklahoma refers is concerned, that has been regularly reported out by one of the standing committees of the House and is ready for consideration. Of course, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] did not mean to include this particular resolution.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman will pardon me, I will say this with reference to that resolution, that it will not be considered by unanimous consent, because I am opposed to it, as the gentleman knows. While I am on that may I say to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] that that resolution, in my judgment, will not be passed prior to the 1st day of July, when it must be considered by France.

Mr. TILSON. The 1st day of August is the date in question.

Mr. GARNER. Some gentlemen in another body—in fact, the Senate—have strongly intimated that that resolution would not be passed except after extended debate. I suggest to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON], before he undertakes to force that resolution through the House, that he consult gentlemen in another body and see whether it is necessary to put this House up against the passage of such a resolution without some hope of its becoming a law.

Mr. TILSON. I simply meant not to include this resolution in any agreement made here. As to other matters, I wish to say to the House, as I have stated to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] on repeated occasions, that I am willing to say that, except for the major business for which we came here—which has now gone through the House and most of which is now pending in another body—only emergency matters should come up; and I have indicated upon a number of occasions what I mean by emergency matters. It does not mean legislation that must be passed in order to prevent the death of some one. It simply means that if the Government is to otherwise suffer loss, or if there is to be great inconvenience to the public in case certain legislation fails to pass, or if in some other way it appears that the public interests may suffer if certain legislation be not passed, I should regard it as an emergency.

Mr. GARNER. We might as well have some understanding about it. I think the gentleman's duty is first to take the responsibility. I wish hereafter, if he O. K's a bill, he would put his O. K. upon it and sign his name to it, so that I might know that he has already passed upon it before the matter comes to me.

Mr. TILSON. I shall try to do that, or to at least talk to the gentleman personally about it, if it is some matter that has not before been considered.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Is it the purpose of the gentleman to take up any further matters from the Committee on Agriculture?

Mr. TILSON. I do not know as to that. If any of the measures reported out by that committee can qualify under the term "emergency," as I have described it, I will at least be open to consider whether it shall receive consideration.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] a question. The gentleman has referred to the report of the joint committee on salaries for employees in the Capitol. I have been unable to get hold of a copy of any such report. Is that report available?

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman will have to see the committee. I have not seen a copy of it, but I am told that it will increase the cost of running the Congress to the extent of about $860,000 a year. That statement has been made to me, but I will not enter an objection now. It undoubtedly will be considered later on.

Mr. MAPES. Does the gentleman know where a copy of the committee report can be had?

Mr. GARNER. I suggest that the gentleman consult the prospective chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. WOOD]. If he does that, I think he will get it.

Mr. MAPES. One of the pages has just returned from the Committee on Appropriations and told me that he was unable to get it.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I am interested to know whether this agreement which was referred to in the colloquy between the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] would have anything to do with a bill having to do with an emergency that is really very urgent, about which I am concerned. Of course, I understand I would have to make my case to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. TILSON. I will say to the gentleman that when matters have not been considered by a committee, the gentleman would also need to go to the prospective chairman and ranking member of that committee before coming to me. In other words, it would have to be by general agreement rather than as a matter of right.

Mr. GARNER. I will say that a number of gentlemen, including the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT], have been to my office inquiring about legislation. I suggested in each instance that they consult the ranking members of the prospective committees of the House. There is only one other condition to make. I know of only one other Democrat who is to be considered. There is a gentleman on this side, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW], who wanted a resolution considered having to do with General Pulaski, and I think I would insist that be considered before I consented to other particular matters receiving consideration.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Will the gentleman propose to consider the report on the national origins?

Mr. TILSON. I can not say as to that.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Would the gentleman feel that the House should stay in session until that is disposed of?

Mr. TILSON. I can not answer that question. The action of the Senate or nonaction on the part of the Senate would determine that question.

Mr. GARNER. As I understand it, when you have completed your reports on the farm relief bill and the census bill, so far as this House is concerned, we shall have completed what we came here to do?

Mr. TILSON. Unless the Senate acts on the national origins bill, that is true.

Mr. GARNER. I understand, but does the gentleman propose that the House should remain in session for an indefinite time awaiting for the consideration of the national origins bill by the Senate? Does the gentleman propose to keep us here waiting for a decision on the part of the Senate on the repeal of the national-origins provision? I think the gentleman ought to try to accommodate the membership by hastening the consideration of things that are necessary.

Mr. TILSON. I shall be glad to do all that is possible to hasten consideration on all of these things, but the delay will not be here.

Mr. SIMMONS. I suggest that on the national-origins proposition the House should pass the same resolution that we have heretofore passed. There is no reason why we should not act on it again when we have acted twice on it heretofore.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it the purpose of the gentleman to call back the membership of the House to vote on the national-origins proposition in the contingency that the Senate should pass it in the last week in June?

Mr. TILSON. We are here to transact the public business.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is one of the bills which the President says should be considered at this session, and yet we are not acting upon it. What is the objection to the suggestion of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] that we should pass the same resolution that has heretofore been passed and thus rid us of the responsibility? In my opinion, we should put it up to the other body.

Mr. TILSON. It is already pending before the other body.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the Senate postpones action upon it until the latter part of June, will this body be required to remain here to consider it?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. We should stay here as long as may be necessary to transact public business, even if it runs to July 1 or beyond July 1.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, did I get permission for the conferees on the part of the House to file a report on the apportionment bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair put it the second time, and there was no objection.

DEATH OF FORMER REPRESENTATIVE GODWIN, OF NORTH CAROLINA

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, information has been received here of the death of Hon. Hannibal Lafayette Godwin, who represented the sixth district of North Carolina for about 12 years. I desire to make that announcement at this time.

FARM RELIEF

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes on the farm bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, if the predictions made by to-day's newspapers are accurate, there is every likelihood that the Senate will reject the conference report on the farm bill and insist that the House vote on the debenture plan.

That is the logical position for the Senate to take. Except in conferences on supply bills, it has always been the custom for the conferees of a House which has not voted specifically on a disputed provision to yield to the House which has voted on it or to return it to their body for further consideration and a record vote.

That is precisely the situation in which the two Houses find themselves on the farm bill. The Senate after days of debate adopted the debenture plan by a yea-and-nay vote. Their conferees are therefore specifically committed to its support. On the other hand, the House leaders have consistently refused to permit a direct vote on the debenture plan, and it is therefore incumbent on its conferees to yield or to bring it back and permit the House also to vote on it.

But the House leadership and the House conferees have been singularly stubborn on this point. They have been so emphatic in their refusal that the Senate conferees report that they finally yielded for the reason that farm legislation could not have been secured at this session of Congress if they had stood on their rights. In other words, Mr. Speaker, the House leadership and the House conferees are willing to see the bill die in conference—willing to see their campaign pledges repudiated and all hope of farm relief lost at a time when farm products are at the lowest level in the history of the Nation—rather than take a vote on the debenture plan.

Now, that is a remarkable situation. It will take only 40 minutes by the clock to call the roll of the House and see how the Members of the House stand on the debenture plan. It is the one greatest issue raised in this session of Congress called to aid the farmer. The Senate has solemnly voted for it. The President has issued two open letters on it. It has been discussed in every newspaper in the United States. It is the one thing that is delaying the farm bill promised by both parties—and at a time when wheat is selling as low as 74 cents a bushel for the first time in a decade. The Senate conferees officially announce that they will promptly recede the instant the House takes a vote on it. And yet the House leadership and the House conferees refuse to give the House that opportunity.

We are about to adjourn in the middle of the afternoon because we have no business to transact. If they will bring the bill in now and let us vote on it we can settle this matter and have the bill on the way to the White House before sundown.

Why will not they let us vote on it? Because they know the conferees do not represent the sentiment of the House. The Republicans on the committee of conference do not represent the Republicans and certainly the Democrats on the committee do not represent the Democrats of the House. They know that the majority of the Members of this House favor the adoption of some method of making the tariff as effective on farm products as it already is on industrial products. And they do not dare permit a vote which would send to the President a bill which would really redeem the promises he made during the campaign of giving agriculture economic equality with industry.

The refusal to permit Members of Congress to vote on this question is subversive of representative government. We have a right to vote on the one issue which is delaying farm relief. And the people at home have a right to know how we vote on it. Refusal to allow a vote on the debenture plan is a travesty on democratic government. But it is more than that. It is a violation of the American spirit of fair play. Never before within the memory of the oldest Member of this House have the rights of the opposition been so flagrantly disregarded as in the consideration of this bill. It began with the introduction of a rule setting aside rules of the House and giving control of all time for debate to those favoring the bill as reported. It is always the rule—and the only fair rule—to divide control of the time for debate equally between those favoring and those opposing a measure. Never before has a major bill been considered under such unfair circumstances. And when the bill came up the power was exercised despotically. A Member criticizing the bill was allowed 15 minutes or no time at all, when entire days were devoted to speeches praising the bill and opposing any change in it.

When amendments were offered to give the farmer the benefit of increased prices points of order were made and unanimous consent was refused, and every care was taken to avoid a direct vote on either the equalization fee or the debenture plan.

When the bill came over from the Senate with the debenture plan added it would have been proper under the rules of the House to have given two opportunities to vote on it in the House. But a drastic rule was brought in again setting aside the rules and sending the bill to conference without a vote on any part of it. And five conferees were appointed, every one of whom was irrevocably committed against the debenture plan, and could be relied on to deny the House a vote on it.

But the most arbitrary violation of the rules of the House came in the consideration of the conference report. It was decided to limit debate on the conference report to one hour. Ordinarily, of course, half the hour would have been controlled by those favoring the conference report and half by those opposing it. But not a minute—not one minute—was allotted to those opposed to the adoption of the report. No man who voted against the conference report was allowed to speak. And the refusal was premeditated and emphatic. It was as if in a court of justice the judge would hear the witnesses and argument of one litigant and then send the case to the jury without permitting the other side to be heard. Even a request for unanimous consent for one minute was refused.

Now, no reference to these excellent gentlemen in charge of the steam roller during the consideration of the farm bill is intended as a reflection upon them, or any of them, individually. Personally they are the finest fellows in the world, and I entertain for every one of them a sincere regard and a deep affection. They are without exception men of the highest character and of unimpeachable integrity. But officially they have shown themselves as ruthless as any pirate that ever scuttled a ship or hoisted the black flag on the Spanish Main.

One of the fundamental passions in the breast of the average American is the love of fair play, for a square deal, the preservation under all circumstances of the spirit of true sportsmanship. And yet the disregard for fair play which has characterized the passage of this bill through the House would, if by a wide stretch of the imagination it could be carried to its logical conclusion, justify a pot shot into a huddled covey of quail or the dynamiting of a pool of black bass.

I trust the Senate will again demonstrate its regard for the immemorial rules of conference and insist that the House vote on the most important question that has arisen in this session of Congress. We are sent here for precisely that purpose—to vote openly and fearlessly on the great questions affecting the welfare of the Nation, not to dodge and scuttle about like creatures of the dark through devious bypaths and underground tunnels.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. CROWTHER (at the request of Mr. HANCOCK), for five days, on account of important business.

DUTY ON IMPORTATION OF SILVER

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very able brief filed with the Finance Committee by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] in support of his proposed amendment to the 1929 tariff act, providing a duty of 30 cents per fine ounce on the importation of silver.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

To the FINANCE COMMITTEE,

United States Senate:

I have the honor to submit for your consideration the following brief in support of my proposed amendment to the 1929 tariff act, providing a duty of 30 cents per fine ounce upon the importation of silver, which proposed amendment was introduced in the Senate and referred to your committee. A copy of such proposed amendment is hereto attached:

Condition of silver-producing industry in United States

	Cents
1913. Average wholesale price of silver per fine ounce	61
1928. Average wholesale price of silver per fine ounce	57
1929. Average wholesale price of silver per fine ounce, as of date of this brief	54

For substantiation of these figures I refer you to page 119 of the annual report of the Director of the United States Mints for fiscal year ended June 30, 1928—last report available—and current market quotations.

Attention is invited to the fact that the price of silver is 12 per cent below the pre-war price, whilst the average wholesale price of all other commodities is 38.7 per cent above the pre-war price of 1913.

I again refer to the said report wherein the Director of the Mint, at page 8, says:

"Silver of domestic production during 1927 totaled 60,434,441 ounces, valued at $34,266,328. This compares with 62,718,746 ounces, valued at $39,136,497 for 1926, and with the record production of 1915, 74,961,075 fine ounces, valued at $37,397,300."

The decrease in the production of mines in the United States, the principal value of whose ores is silver, is even greater than is indicated by the above figures. In some mines the production of silver has increased by reason of increased production of copper, but the decrease in those mines known as silver mines has been very great. In support of this assertion I again quote from the said report, at page 29, wherein the Director of the Mint says:

"Individual States' material differences in silver production as compared with the prior year include decreases of approximately 1,000,000 ounces each in Arizona, Colorado, and Nevada, and an increase of over 1,300,000 ounces in Idaho."

The increase in the production of silver in Idaho was due to the increase in the production of lead and copper mines in that State where silver was produced as a by-product. Taking the total production of the States of Arizona, Colorado, and Nevada for 1927, it will be ascertained from such statement of the Director of the Mint that the decrease in those States represents the following percentages:

	Per cent
Arizona	14
Colorado	20
Nevada	20

The States of Arizona, Colorado, and Nevada, which show such enormous decrease in the production of silver, chiefly contain those mines known as "silver mines," the chief value of whose ores is in silver. Many of the "silver mines" in the United States have closed down by reason of the low price of the metal, the high cost of mining, and the large importation of silver from Latin-American countries, where standards of living are low and labor is cheap. Whilst the production of "silver mines" in the United States has decreased, the production of "silver mines" in Latin-American countries has greatly increased.

The chief production of silver in the United States at the present time is derived from the mining of mixed ores such as copper, lead, and zinc ores in the Western States where the silver occurs as a by-product. While such by-product is comparatively small in value by comparison with the value of the other metals in such ores and does not pay its proportionate part of the cost of the mining and reduction of such ores, it is mixed with the other metals in the ores, and therefore must be mined and separated.

Domestic production, consumption, imports

	Fine ounces
1927. United States production	60,434,441
1927. United States consumption	50,635,383
1927. United States importation	103,941,485

(See pages 8, 9, 41, 46, 47, 78, and 79, Director of the Mint's report before referred to.)

Source of silver imports	Ounces
Mexico	69,607,578
South America	17,498,903
Canada	8,015,890
Other countries	8,819,114
Total	103,941,485

(See pages 78 and 79 of said mint report.)

COST OF PRODUCTION OF SILVER IN THE UNITED STATES AND IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES FROM WHICH WE IMPORT SILVER

Average wages paid for labor in the leading mines producing silver in the United States, as shown on page 1 of Bulletin No. 394 of United States Bureau of Labor Statistics for 1924 is 59.9 cents per hour, or for an 8-hour day $4.79. This is the latest report gotten out, and it is well known that wages of miners in the Western States where the metalliferous mines exist were recently increased by reason of the rise in the price of copper, and therefore it is safe to say that the average wage is nearer $5 per day than $4.79, which existed in 1924.

Average wages paid for labor in the leading mines producing silver in the other countries exporting to the United States, other than Canada, $1.21 per day.

I have been unable to obtain the average wage paid miners in Canada, but do not consider it material, as only a small portion of our imports of silver come from Canada.

Take, for instance, the average wage of mine laborers in Mexico, which is approximately the wage paid such labor in other Latin-American countries. I quote from the special report obtained by the Engineering and Mining Journal on January 14, 1928:

"Northern Sonora, 5.27 pesos daily; Chihuahua, 4; Coahuila, 2.85; Lower California, 3.45; Guanajuato, 1.66; Jalisco, 2.07; Zacatecas, 2.88; Hidalgo, 3; Oaxaca, 1.68; Michoacan, 2.10; Guerrero, 1.64; and State of Mexico, 1.65."

These figures are given in pesos. The peso is the standard silver money of Mexico. Its price varies in accordance with the price of silver. At the present time it is worth in our money 41 cents. The highest daily wage paid miners in Mexico is in Sonora, which is 5.27 pesos, which is equal to $2.15 a day in our money. The average wage paid the miners in Mexico according to the above report, in our money, would be $1.21.

The only report that I have been able to obtain, as prepared by the Ministry of Industry, Commerce and Labor, Mexico, dealing with the wages of miners in Mexico, relates only to the States of Hidalgo and Guanajuato. This report states that the wages paid to miners (peons), based on an 8-hour day and measured in our money is: State of Hidalgo, $1.50; State of Guanajuato, $1.46.

It is hardly probable that a government department of Mexico, who is seeking to maintain her exports to the United States, would underestimate the wages paid to miners. I would give more credence to the report by a special investigator of the Engineering and Mining Journal, which is so conservative and accurate in its statements.

It is not very material, however, which figures we adopt, as the fact remains that the average wages paid in the mines that produce silver in the United States are at least three times the wages paid in similar mines in Mexico. The 8-hour law is not universally adopted in the mines of Mexico as it is in the mines which are the chief producers of silver in the United States. In many cases, and, in fact, in most cases, the day's labor is 10 hours and longer.

I presume that the cost of materials used in mining in the respective countries is similar by comparison to the costs of labor in such countries. This presumption is sustained by the evidence given before the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives in the hearings held upon the 1929 tariff act.

COMPARATIVE ECONOMIC CONDITION OF SILVER MINING INDUSTRY

I ask your consideration of the comparative economic condition of the silver mining industry with industries producing other commodities. Taking the wholesale prices of all commodities in 1913 as the basis for determining the increase or decrease of such prices since that date and until the present time we will assume that the price for the product in 1913 was 100 per cent. In other words, the Department of Commerce in making its index figures to determine the average increase or decrease in the wholesale price of a product since 1913 takes the figures of 100. What are the results of the compilation by the Department of Commerce relative to the increase or decrease in the wholesale price of commodities as of date April, 1929? They are as follows:

1913, average of all commodities	100
1929, average of all commodities	138.7
1913, average of farm products	100
1929, average of farm products	146.7
1913, average of all foods	100
1929, average of all foods	152.2
1913, average of textile products	100
1929, average of textile products	166.7
1913, average of building products	100
1929, average of building products	172.7
1913, average price fine silver per ounce	100
1929, average price fine silver per ounce	88.5

I attach hereto letter from the Department of Commerce transmitting to me index number of wholesale prices by major commodity groups upon which the percentages above set out are taken.

So the prices of all products have risen above the 1913 pre-war prices from 38.7 per cent for an average of all commodities to 72.7 per cent for building products, except silver, and that commodity has decreased in price since 1913 12 per cent.

The tariff bill of 1929, to a certain extent, has provided a tariff duty upon certain raw products that have heretofore been upon the free list, and has slightly increased the tariff duty upon other raw products.

For instance, the following duty is provided on the following metals:

Iron in pigs and iron kentledge, $1.12½ per ton.

Manganese ore or concentrates containing in excess of 30 per cent of metallic manganese, 1 cent per pound on the metallic manganese contained therein.

Tungsten ore or concentrates, 50 cents per pound on the metallic tungsten contained therein.

Silicon aluminum, aluminum silicon, alsimin, ferrosilicon aluminum, and ferroaluminum silicon, 5 cents per pound.

Aluminum, aluminum scrap, and alloys in which aluminum is the component material of chief value, in crude form, 5 cents per pound.

Lead-bearing ores, flue dust, and mattes of all kinds, 1½ cents per pound on the lead contained therein.

Lead bullion or base bullion, lead in pigs and bars, lead dross, reclaimed lead, scrap lead, antimonial lead, antimonial scrap lead, type metal, babbitt metal, solder, all alloys or combinations of lead not specially provided for, 2½ cents per pound on the lead contained therein.

On zinc there is a rising schedule of duties provided.

The manufacture of silver articles and wares is protected. Paragraph 398 provides:

"Articles or wares not specially provided for, if composed wholly or in chief value of platinum, gold, or silver, and articles or wares plated with platinum, gold, or silver, or colored with gold lacquer, whether partly or wholly manufactured, 65 per cent ad valorem; if composed wholly or in chief value of iron, steel, lead, copper, brass, nickel, pewter, zinc, aluminum, or other metal, but not plated with platinum, gold, or silver, or colored with gold lacquer, whether partly or wholly manufactured, 50 per cent ad valorem."

The manufacture of articles or wares made of or containing silver are in competition chiefly with such articles and wares made in such countries as Germany, England, France, and Italy. The average wages paid to laborers in such manufacturing industry in the countries coming in competition with the manufacture of articles and wares containing silver in the United States are not nearly so low by comparison with the American wage in such industry as the wages of miners in Mexico and other Latin-American countries are by comparison with the wages paid in the mines in the United States producing silver.

The value of the silver contained in most of the articles and wares protected in paragraph 398 is only a very small percentage of the total value of such articles and wares.

If silver were placed on an economic equality with the average of all commodities, then the pre-war price of 61 cents per fine ounce would have to be increased 38.7 per cent. If the pre-war price of silver of 61 cents per ounce were increased 38.7 per cent that would mean 23.4 cents, which, added to the pre-war price of 61 cents, would give a price of 84.4 cents per ounce. The difference between the present price of silver of 54 cents and the equalized price of 84 cents would be 30 cents.

If silver were placed upon an economic equality with the average price of all farm products the pre-war price would have to be raised 46.7 per cent, which would mean that the price would be raised 28.4 cents. Twenty-eight and four-tenths cents added to the pre-war price of 61 cents would give 89.4 cents that the price of silver at present would have to be at to be on an economic equality with the average wholesale price of all farm products.

Deducting the present price of silver of 54 cents from 89.4 cents we have 35.4 cents, the price that would have to be added to the present price of silver to place it upon an economic equality with the average wholesale price of farm products.

It is the desire of the administration, and in fact the expressed desire of both great political parties to raise the average wholesale price of farm products to an economic equality with the wholesale price of other more favored products. If the average wholesale price of farm products is raised, then the wholesale price of silver would have to be raised more than 35.4 cents per ounce to be maintained upon an economic equality with the average wholesale price of farm products.

It is evident, therefore, that a duty of 30 cents an ounce is justified under the pledges of both parties to maintain an economic equality as between the various industries.

If the duty on silver is based on the difference in cost of production in the countries from which silver is imported and the cost of production in the United States, then the duty should be more than 100 per cent ad valorem, or over 54 cents an ounce.

I respectfully contend that this request for a duty of 30 cents an ounce is well within the promises made in the platforms of both the Republican and Democratic Parties relative to duties upon imports.

Silver is a valuable product of our country and is used throughout the world as money in the form of coins. Silver is used almost exclusively as the measure of values and the medium of exchange in China and India. As China becomes pacified and develops, our trade with China should increase, and at least be equal to that of any other country in the world. A large production of silver at that time will be of great value to our whole country.

The closing down of our silver mines throughout the West has affected every industry in that section of our country. It has particularly injured the farmers by depriving them of their most valuable market, the local market.

I unhesitatingly say that the silver-producing industry has not only been the most neglected but has been the most outrageously treated industry of any in the United States. Our own Government buys foreign silver at as cheap a price as it can obtain and then manufactures it into dimes, quarters, and halves and sells such dimes, quarters, and halves to banks and to commerce at a value of $1.38 an ounce. During the fiscal year 1928, as the report of the Director of the Mint shows, the Treasury Department purchased several million ounces of foreign silver at an average of 57 cents an ounce, and disposed of such silver at a valuation of $1.38 an ounce in the form of subsidiary coin.

More should be done for the silver-mining industry than is sought in this amendment, but I hope to get immediate action and therefore have made a minimum request.

Respectfully submitted.

KEY PITTMAN,

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
BUREAU OF FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC COMMERCE,
Washington, May 28, 1929.

Hon. KEY PITTMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of May 24 requesting index numbers showing commodity prices on a 1913 base.

The old series of index numbers of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, shown in Table 333 of the Statistical Abstract of the United States for 1928, has been discontinued. The Bureau of Labor Statistics is now issuing regularly a series of index numbers on a 1926 base, but has carried this new series back as far as 1913. For your convenience I am sending you, inclosed, a table showing this new series of index numbers converted to a 1913 base. Data are shown by groups for each year since 1913 and for each month since January, 1928.

I trust that these index numbers will be satisfactory for your purpose.

Very truly yours,

O. P. HOPKINS, Acting Director.

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. PITTMAN to the bill (H. R. 2667) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, to protect American labor, and for other purposes, viz: At the proper place insert three additional paragraphs, as follows, to wit:

"PAR. —. Silver-bearing ores and mattes of all kinds, 30 cents per ounce on the silver contained therein: Provided, That on all importations of silver-bearing ores and mattes of all kinds the duties shall be estimated at the port of entry and a bond given in double the amount of such estimated duties for the transportation of the ores or mattes by common carriers bonded for the transportation of appraised or unappraised merchandise to properly equipped sampling or smelting establishments, whether designated as bonded warehouses or otherwise. On the arrival of the ores or mattes at such establishments they shall be sampled according to commercial methods under the supervision of Government officers, who shall be stationed at such establishments, and who shall submit the samples thus obtained to a Government assayer, designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall make a proper assay of the sample and report the result to the proper customs officers, and the import entries shall be liquidated thereon. And the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make all necessary regulations to enforce the provisions of this paragraph.

"PAR. —. Silver bullion or base bullion, silver dross, reclaimed silver, scrap silver, all alloys or combinations of silver not specially provided for, 30 cents per ounce on the silver contained therein.

"PAR. —. Silver-bearing ores, mattes, base bullion, silver dross, reclaimed silver, scrap silver, and all alloys or combinations of silver imported into the United States for the purpose of processing or refining for export to a foreign country and not for use, sale, or disposition within the United States or any of its possessions, may be imported for such purpose free of duty upon the execution of a bond given in double the amount of the estimated duties that would be charged upon such silver contents so imported if for use, sale, or disposition in the United States, conditioned that such silver contents will not be used, sold, or otherwise disposed of in the United States prior to export therefrom, and upon further compliance with such regulations and guaranties as the Secretary of the Treasury may by regulations require.

JEFFERSON DINNER ADDRESSES

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the addresses made last night before the Jefferson Association of Washington.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The addresses are as follows:

SPEECH OF JOHN J. RASKOB, CHAIRMAN OF THE DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL COMMITTEE, AT A DINNER GIVEN BY THE JEFFERSON ASSOCIATION OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA IN HONOR OF JOUETT SHOUSE, CHAIRMAN OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE, ON MONDAY NIGHT, JUNE 10, 1929

Mr. Chairman and friends, first, let me say that nothing more enheartening could happen to those of us engaged in building the Democratic Party into a strong, virile national organization than your presence here to-night as guests of the Jefferson Democratic Association of Washington, to honor Jouett Shouse.

A great part of the press, which is largely Republican, would make it appear that the Democratic Party is dead. Such is far from the truth. The amazing thing is that with merely a makeshift national organization, we should have accomplished so much. True, the number of votes polled in the Electoral College was relatively small, but no one appreciates better than the Republican organization the fact that this was due to issues injected into the campaign which should have no part in our political life. To a man trained in business, the Democratic Party's lack of organization for conducting a national campaign is appalling. When Mr. Will Hays was elected chairman of the Republican National Committee, he immediately started to build a strong national organization, and worked incessantly to this end. The Republican Party to-day is profiting from the results of his accomplishments. In the last election the Democratic Party polled upward of 15,000,000 votes against about 21,000,000 polled by the Republicans. This is a difference of 6,000,000 votes, and means that had we had a national organization functioning over the previous four years, we would only have had to persuade 3,000,000 out of over 36,000,000 voters to believe in the principles of our great party in order to have secured a majority of the popular vote. It is also true that had the Democratic Party been organized in a manner that could have changed the votes of about 450,000 people, properly located, it would have carried the Electoral College for the Democratic ticket. I cite these figures for no purpose other than to demonstrate the need and power of organization, as that is the job we must address ourselves to now. It is not an intricate job, but it is one that requires strenuous, continuous effort and a tremendous amount of real hard work; it involves securing what you might call Democratic counselors in every one of the 150,000 election districts in the United States, through which Democratic principles may be taught to the citizens of our country. This is no mean task. It involves the creation of a money-raising organization that will result in a natural flow of funds in relatively small amounts from the citizens of the country who will contribute because of their belief in the need of two strong parties to insure a continuation of success in our form of government. Our deficit has been reduced from upward of $1,550,000 to less than $500,000, and with the promises and pledges in hand, I confidently expect a further reduction to under $350,000 during the current month. This $350,000, together with an additional $250,000 to cover expenses of building and conducting a national organization, we contemplate raising through allotting this amount to the States, and if each member of the national committee and each State chairman will do his bit, this means that an average of only about $4 per election district will be needed to free the party entirely of debt and give it a fund of $250,000 with which to operate.

So much for finances and the past.

Now, let us look to the future. The Democratic Party believes in those principles of freedom and liberty which the founders of our Government endeavored to guarantee to posterity when they framed and signed the Constitution of the United States. In this dollar age, in which the present generations are living, so much importance has been attached to the matter of acquiring wealth and success industrially that our people seem to be losing, in part at least, the really fine spirit of patriotism enjoyed by our forefathers, and when we talk of State rights, of which Jefferson was ever a strong supporter and defender, there are countless thousands of our citizens, both men and women under 30 years of age, who have little, if any, understanding of what we are talking about. In my opinion the continuation of the tendency of the Republican Party to centralize greater and greater powers in our Federal Government in Washington, instead of building each of our 48 States into strong sovereignties, is bound to result in a power so colossal as to be unwieldy and incapable of administration. The lack of respect for such a government and the tyranny under which our people will have to live in consequence thereof may well result in a revolution which will divide this country into two or three republics and our posterity will then suffer the ills which the countries of Europe have suffered through jealousies, lack of trust, standing armies, etc., for countless generations.

As a result of the freedom secured for us by our forefathers through declaring their independence from living in tyranny through shedding their blood in the Revolutionary War, and through setting up a new government, the people of the United States have enjoyed life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness to a degree unheard of in the history of the world. But we have reached the crossroads, and, in my opinion, there has never been a time in the history of our country when the States and the Nation more needed the unselfish, intelligent thought and interest of its citizens than now. To awaken this interest and educate our people to the dangers of losing our freedom and liberty is the job of the Democratic Party. No finer example of patriotism and unselfish devotion to a cause can be cited than the life of Jouett Shouse and the great thing he has done in coming down here to Washington and agreeing to devote his entire time and energies to the building of that kind of organization necessary to protect and preserve our party and thus preserve our Government and the liberties and freedom which it guarantees.

SPEECH OF JOUETT SHOUSE, CHAIRMAN OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF THE DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL COMMITTEE, AT DINNER GIVEN IN HIS HONOR BY THE JEFFERSON DEMOCRATIC ASSOCIATION OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA THE NIGHT OF JUNE 10, 1929

The Jefferson Democratic Association is well named. One hundred and thirty years ago the Democratic Party was organized by the Sage of Monticello, because there was obvious need for such a party. During its long and honorable existence it has fulfilled the useful purposes responsible for its creation. It has lived because it has fought a good fight, because it has been the friend of the common man, because it has voiced the aspirations of the great, struggling, inarticulate masses of humanity. It will continue to live, and never has there been greater need for it to exercise a controlling influence in the affairs of our Government than there is to-day. Never has there been greater need for the country to get back to the teachings and the philosophy of the immortal Jefferson.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, it is a source of gratification that the first public address made by me as chairman of the executive committee of the Democratic National Committee is under the auspices of the Jefferson Democratic Association of the District of Columbia. I deeply appreciate the spirit in which other Democratic organizations of the District have joined in making this dinner a success. If we may depend upon your help and your assistance as fellow Democrats during the next three years it will greatly strengthen us in what we are trying to do.

At the outset permit me to say that the ambitious plan which has been undertaken here was conceived by our national chairman, John J. Raskob. Confronted with a deficit of over a million and a half dollars at the close of the last campaign, Mr. Raskob went quietly to work to pay the obligations which the national organization had assumed. So successful have been his efforts, so remarkable the energy and industry with which he has faced the task, that over $1,000,000 of that deficit has now been wiped out. Some weeks ago he conceived the idea that important organization work preparatory to the congressional elections of 1930 and the presidential election of 1932 should be undertaken at this time. The plan was submitted to a number of prominent Democrats in Congress and elsewhere, all of whom enthusiastically indorsed it. It was due to the insistence of Mr. Raskob that after great hesitation I consented to give up virtually my private affairs for the next three years and come to Washington as chairman of the executive committee to take charge of the headquarters established here.

In years past the activities of the Democratic national organization have been largely confined to a period of approximately three months preceding a presidential election. We have had many able and well-intentioned men at the head of our committee. Most of them have earnestly desired to try to carry on through the off seasons the work of necessary organization. They have been hampered by lack of funds, by debts hanging over from past campaigns, and by other circumstances and conditions which have made it practically, if not entirely, impossible to attempt such work on an effective scale. No party can hope, with any degree of certainty, to win elections through mere spasmodic efforts. A political party is in many regards like a business organization, and unless it is run on business principles its chance of success is greatly lessened.

What we propose to set up here is a businesslike national headquarters that will function continuously, day in and day out, week in and week out, month in and month out, to lay the groundwork in every proper way for the building up of an organization of the Democratic Party, for the education of the people as to what is taking place in the conduct of their Government by the party now in power, and for an earnest effort to win them to the support of our party, first in the election of the next Congress and later in the election of the next President of the United States. With this in view, three major activities will be undertaken—organization, publicity, and research. The publicity and research divisions can take care of themselves, but obviously the division of organization can not properly function, and, therefore, the work of the headquarters be made a success, unless we have the cooperation, the helpful counsel, the constructive aid of Democrats everywhere, and particularly of Democratic leaders in every State and every congressional district of the country. No political organization can carry on successfully merely at the top. There must be an adequate national plan. But such plan can not be put into practical effect unless the State organizations will lend the fullest and the most hearty assistance. In turn, the State must look to the county, and the county to the precinct, so that, after all, in building up an effective Democratic machine, if we succeed in doing that, it must reach down to the very precinct unit, involving the support of the precinct committeemen and committeewomen, to enable it properly to carry on. Willingness on the part of the necessary number in the smallest unit to work coordinately and under direction will determine the success or failure of the enterprise.

I am approaching the large task before me with a full realization of its difficulties and with real humility of spirit. Neither I nor any other man alone can accomplish the purpose which is in mind. I shall need, and I earnestly desire, suggestions and advice and help from Democrats and forward-looking men and women everywhere. And only as such help is given the possibility of making the national headquarters successful will be determined.

May I make it very plain to you that I have no exaggerated notion of my province and my responsibilities? It is not for me to determine party policies. The chosen congressional spokesmen of constituencies of the various States and the various subdivisions of States must do that as issues arise. It is, however, entirely proper for me to make suggestions that may seem helpful and to do anything in my power to bring Democrats into harmonious accord. By their willingness to work together, and only thereby, whether in the Congress or in the States, can an effective and appealing party policy be formulated.

In view of this plan and its practical value, I should be utterly lacking in appreciation if I did not pause here to pay tribute to the man who conceived it. During the campaign last fall and in frequent contacts since I have had the opportunity to get to know John Raskob well. From that knowledge I can state positively that without ulterior motive, without selfish design or personal ambition, without reference to the candidacy of any man for any office, but solely with a desire to be of service to his country through the instrumentality of the Democratic Party, he has put into effect the idea of a permanent, working, constructive organization. There is no office that he would accept. There is nothing that he asks of life that he has not attained. His whole thought and his whole being are dedicated in a most definite way to the service of his fellow men, and the only reward that he would have is the knowledge of that service being effective.

There is one thing with which the Washington headquarters will refuse absolutely to have any concern. That is the question of candidacies. It is our duty and our responsibility and our effort to try to build up an effective fighting force to turn over to those who will direct the next campaign. The most unwise, the most destructive action that could be taken would be to lend, even to the slightest degree, any part of the influence or help or encouragement of national headquarters to the candidacy of any of the various men who may aspire to the next presidential nomination. I can not too definitely impress upon you my earnestness in making this statement. I know that Mr. Raskob feels exactly as do I, and I call upon you and upon Democrats everywhere not to embarrass the national headquarters in the constructive work which it will attempt to do by trying even remotely to relate it or its efforts to the plan for a nomination, no matter who may be the man concerned or how outstanding his qualifications. If we have an effective, militant organization of the party forces ready to be turned over at the time the next candidate is nominated, his possibilities of success will be vastly enhanced. To that, and to that alone, our efforts will be dedicated. This is the plan of the national chairman; this is the plan of the executive chairman.

In the presidential campaign of 1920 we heard much of the slogan "A return to normalcy." Just what "normalcy" means I have never been able to discover, but I well know what the American people got when they placed in power the party that advocated this return. From the heights of idealism down to normalcy, and we had the oil scandals of Fall and Doheny and Sinclair; we had the rape of the Veterans' Bureau by Forbes; we had bribery in the Alien Property Custodian's office; we had the debauchery of high officials in the Government of the United States which reached into the very Cabinet of the President itself.

In 1924 the slogan was "A return to silence." What did that "silence" produce? Certainly during the ensuing four years the masses of the people got nothing. Big business got everything.

I have no desire to attempt to prejudge the present administration. If in its policies and program, if in its legislative measures things are accomplished for the benefit of the American people, I shall warmly commend them. Pursuant to an election promise, the President called an extraordinary session of Congress which was designed, according to his explicit statement, to give relief to the farmer. Two avenues were to be used for this purpose: First, constructive measures to deal with the marketing of crops, and, second, a limited revision of certain tariff schedules having direct bearing upon agriculture. There is now pending in conference a definite administration farm relief bill. It will probably become a law within the next few days. I for one shall await its operation before attempting to criticise it. But let the record be clear—it definitely represents the ideas and the plans of the President. It is enacted by a Congress in each House of which the Republican Party has a large majority. It is in its very essence an administration measure. If it meets the requirements of the farmers' situation, the administration will deserve the credit. If it fails, the administration must accept the responsibility.

As part of the administration's special program a tariff bill was recently passed by the House of Representatives under a gag rule. Remember that the Republican Party has a majority of more than a hundred in the House of Representatives where, under the Constitution, all revenue legislation must originate. Mind you, Congress was supposed to write a tariff bill for the benefit of the farmer with revision of only a limited number of schedules. Instead of that the House of Representatives, with its overwhelming Republican majority, under the direction of Republican leadership, has passed the most reprehensible tariff bill in the history of the country. What will be the final form of that bill remains to be seen. If it is corrected, as I trust it may be, that correction must be at the hands of the Democrats of the Senate of the United States, with the assistance of Progressives from the West.

I congratulate the Democrats of the Senate upon the constructive steps they have already taken to amend the House bill, and I beg, if I may, to voice the earnest hope that they will substitute for the multifarious improprieties of the pending Republican bill schedules which will give proper measure of protection to the farmers at the same time safeguarding the consumers, and will not permit the measure to continue merely a grab bag into which special interests may thrust their greedy fists and pull out what they please at the expense of the great mass of the people. In the fight to correct this threatened legislative evil the Democrats have taken the lead and they are having the support of a great mass of independent newspapers and even many Republican papers. These I commend for their patriotism. If this tariff bill is properly modified, let the country remember to whom the credit is due. Let the country not overlook the fact that without any suggestion of change, although its intolerable schedules had been widely discussed in the press of all sections, the President allowed the overwhelming majority of his party in the House of Representatives to do its part to write this infamous measure into law. If the President wanted the bill changed, he had ample opportunity to make the attempt to have it changed while it was under consideration by the House. If, at this late date, he should make some veiled suggestions of the wisdom of change, is it not fair to think that they may be dictated by a policy of cautious expediency as a result of the widespread revolt?

We hear two vastly different assertions from Republican leaders. One group claims that the Democratic Party is a free-trade party. The other group claims that there is no difference between the Democratic tariff policy and the Republican tariff policy. Both statements are equally false. The Democratic Party recognizes that the capital invested in American industry should be properly safeguarded. It recognizes that the wage scale of the American workingman, for which the Democratic administration of Woodrow Wilson is primarily responsible, must be and shall be maintained. Therefore the Democratic Party stands for a necessary tariff. But the Democratic Party is definitely and unalterably opposed to using the tariff as a smoke screen to allow the favored contributors to Republican campaign funds to rob the masses of the American people under the guise of protection.

In the actions of the Republican Congress in the special session now convened the Democratic Party has an issue of an importance to the American people which can not be exaggerated. Let us, my fellow Democrats, take full advantage of it. Let us agree upon a program and carry through that program. Let us offer constructive measures in place of the selfish measures which the opposition is offering. If we adhere to such a policy we shall stand an excellent chance to win control of the Congress next year, and, should that be done, as certainly as time goes on we shall win the Presidency in 1932.

It is proper at this time, and at all times, for Democrats to pay tribute to the glorious past history of the party. The genius of Thomas Jefferson, author of the Declaration of Independence; the wisdom of James Madison, father of the Constitution; the courage of Andrew Jackson, militant leader of the people in both war and peace; the sturdy honesty of Grover Cleveland; and the practical idealism of Woodrow Wilson have left us a heritage which we have a right to acclaim. God grant that we of this generation may dedicate ourselves to the service of our country with the same devotion as did these great figures of the past.

SPEECH OF REPRESENTATIVE JOSEPH W. BYRNS BEFORE THE JEFFERSON ASSOCIATION OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, Democrats were greatly gratified when it was announced by the able chairman of our National Committee that it was his intention to maintain permanent headquarters in Washington. The greatest handicap under which the Democratic Party has labored in past years is either the lack of information or the actual misinformation of the people concerning the conduct of their public affairs.

The opposition party—the party of privilege, which, as a distinguished Democratic nominee for President said a few years ago, always has something to sell to those whom it serves—has controlled and continues to control most of the avenues of publicity, and hence the accomplishments of the Democratic Party under the leadership of that great Democrat, Woodrow Wilson, and likewise those things for which it has stood and fought during eight years of Republican misrule have never been fully understood and appreciated. And so I am sure that I speak the sentiment of Democrats generally when I say to Mr. Raskob that he has rendered a real service to the cause of democracy in the action which he has taken. It has given to the Democrats of the Nation not only a hope but a promise of success in the elections to come. And need I say to you who know him that the chairman displayed that excellent judgment and wise discrimination that have characterized him in the conduct of his private affairs when he chose for the head and active leadership in the headquarters which he has established the honored guest of the evening—the Hon. Jouett Shouse. A product and citizen of the South and the great Middle West, which he at one time ably represented in Congress; possessing an intimate knowledge of the great and constructive work of Woodrow Wilson's administration, of which he was an important part; thoroughly familiar with the history of our party and imbued with an earnest belief in its underlying principles, his appointment was an ideal one, and we rejoice in the selection in the confident belief that active control has been placed in the hands of the right man, and we pledge him our earnest cooperation in the important work before him.

No one can be wholly satisfied with conditions as they exist in our National Government to-day. Congress was called into extra session, we were told, because agriculture needed immediate relief. It was declared that a farm relief bill would be passed and that there would be a limited revision of the tariff with the primary, if not the only, purpose of relieving agriculture from its distressed condition. But it appears that this was made the excuse for bringing about a general revision of the tariff upward on commodities already highly protected and in which special interests are deeply concerned. The House has passed a tariff bill imposing higher tariff rates than were ever carried in any bill in the entire history of the country. It raised rates on certain products of industry which will cost the consumers of these products hundreds of millions of dollars, and the increased duty on sugar will cost the homes of the country three hundred and forty millions a year. Instead of carrying out the declared purpose of equalizing the tariff benefits on agricultural and industrial products, it has increased the difference by raising the rates on industry over 1 per cent more than it did on agriculture.

Under its provisions, the constitutional prerogative of Congress to levy taxes are surrendered to the President by giving him the authority to change the tariff rates to the extent of 50 per cent. We have proceeded entirely too far in the centralization of power here in Washington, to such an extent as to threaten the foundation of our institutions, and now Congress proposes to give into the hands of the President the most important privilege of the people—the power to impose and levy taxes.

The South and the country expected that the distinguished engineer in the White House would have some plan for the prompt utilization for the Government's enormous investment at Muscle Shoals which a Republican administration has permitted to lie practically idle for 10 years. But we are told that this is not to be considered at this session, although there is ample time to do so.

The agricultural West and the country expected that some concrete plan for farm relief would be proposed. But if Mr. Hoover had a plan it was never submitted and Congress was left to work out its own plan. A bill is about to be passed which has had the support of members of both parties in the hope that it will be of some relief, but many farm organizations, as well as many Members of Congress, have declared that it does not go far enough and will not afford the fullest measure of relief that is possible.

And now with the tariff bill pending in the Senate, and with business in suspense on account of the uncertainty; with agriculture still suffering, the Republican leaders are planning for Congress to take a recess of several months with the tasks for which it was actually called uncompleted. An unusual and really distressing situation confronts the country. A Republican President, a Republican Senate, and a Republican House do not seem to be able to agree upon anything. Neither is willing to trust the judgment of the other in solving the problems confronting them. Leadership no longer exists. They are floundering in a sea of doubt and uncertainty. What can we expect for the future prosperity of our country under such circumstances? They do not know what to do or which way to turn and now they propose to go home for a season with the Micawber-like hope that in the meantime some idea will suggest itself or some one may think of a solution for the problems which have arisen under Republican rule to plague the body politic.

It is surprising that evidences of the dissatisfaction of the people have been clearly manifested in the only two elections which have occurred since Mr. Hoover was inaugurated. One in Kentucky, where a Republican majority of 4,000 last November was turned into a Democratic majority of over 1,000 a few days ago, and the other in a Pennsylvania district, which is over 2 to 1 Republican, but where the Democratic candidate was defeated on the face of returns by only 1,000 votes out of over 60,000 cast, and where a contest is to be instituted because of alleged frauds and the corrupt use of large sums by the Republican machine—a practice which seems to have become a habit in Republican elections in Pennsylvania.

The Democratic Party, although in the minority in both branches of Congress, has an opportunity to render a splendid service to the country, and if it renders that service faithfully and intelligently it is certain to be swept into power by a people who are already disappointed by the procrastination, the failure, and the uncertainty of the present administration and Congress. Let us not waste our energy in wrangling over issues which do not involve the fundamental principles of our party. Let us rather exert ourselves to create a constructive program in the interest of the prosperity of the country and stand together on those principles in which we all believe and which have preserved our party during all the years of our Republic. Why bother now about who will be the candidate and what will be the issues three years hence? No one can say three years in advance who our candidate will be or what the issues will be in the next campaign. Our leader in the last campaign has recently declared that the issues will be made by the Democrats who are in Congress. The Democracy will choose its candidate when the time comes.

Many were led away in the last campaign on issues which had no proper place in that contest, but which were magnified by a subtle opposition and an unfriendly press. We have had and still have lines of cleavage in our party, but true followers of Thomas Jefferson should forget these differences in the fight against the common enemy. The Democratic Party is big enough; its record is glorious enough to embrace among its following everyone who loves his Government and who believes that it should be administered for the benefit of all the people and not alone for the favored few. To everyone who believes in popular government; to everyone who believes in its orderly processes and that all laws on the statute books should be enforced; to everyone who is opposed to the further centralization of power at Washington; to everyone who believes as did Jefferson, Jackson, Cleveland, and Wilson that the benefits of government should be impartially bestowed and that one class of our citizenship should not be preferred over another the call is insistent to lay aside any prejudices we may have and forget any differences which may have swayed us in the past. The restoration of Democratic policies and principles in our Government is too important to be jeopardized by a division in our ranks as we stand facing the common foe. If we resolve to follow this course, then we may confidently look forward to the triumphant success of a united and militant democracy under the leadership of the honor guest of the evening.

LAYING OF THE DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE BUILDING CORNER STONE

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I ask that there be printed in the RECORD a statement from the Washington Star of last evening by Mr. Frederic William Wile on the laying of the corner stone of the Department of Commerce Building yesterday, and some very splendid comments on our President and the important part he has played in the building of the Department of Commerce to its present state and in his successful efforts in the planning of this building.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

[From the Washington Star, Monday, June 10, 1929]

WASHINGTON OBSERVATIONS

By Frederic William Wile

That mammoth pile which some day will surmount the corner stone which President Hoover is laying this afternoon will be called the Department of Commerce, but it's bound to be known in future as the Hoover monument. At least no one could wish a more impressive memento of his fame than such a building. Close by there looms high above the glorious treetops of the Mall the graceful shaft reared to the memory of our other engineer President. The Washington Monument and the Hoover departmental palace are thus appropriate neighbors. In its magnificent dimensions the building is a worthy companion of the Monument. Its length of one thousand and odd feet is nearly twice the height of the world's most beautiful obelisk. Within the yawning space in which the Commerce Building's foundations are being laid the Woolworth Building, tower and all, could be deposited, with plenty of room alongside for the 44-story Equitable Building, in lower Broadway, and the new Madison Square Garden. The Yale bowl could be swallowed up, and so could the Yankee Stadium.

Uncle Sam's most colossal Government building is the product of Herbert Hoover's vision. It was planned under his personal direction. Hoover started out eight years ago to make the Department of Commerce the biggest and busiest branch of the whole executive system, and he did it. In March, 1921, the number of daily services rendered to American business averaged about 700. At present these run to some 11,000 every working day. Of course, no other unit of the Government has undergone so fabulous an expansion of its activities. That's why it was found necessary to put up a 1,000 by 400 foot 7-story and basement structure to house a working staff of 5,000 men and women. Some of the dimensional details of the colossus are staggering. It'll have a cafeteria capable of serving 3,000 persons at one time. Several courtyards within the building will be as wide as Pennsylvania Avenue. The Bureau of Fisheries (always one of Hoover's pets) will install the biggest aquarium in the world, consisting of 40 or 50 specially designed huge tanks, filled with almost everything that swims and has fins. Such is the house that Herbert built.

MUNICIPALLY OWNED POWER IN THE STATE OF WASHINGTON

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a copy of the initiative bill which has been proposed by the National Grange of the State of Washington to be voted on at a referendum. This bill is simply in the nature of an enabling act to give the people of the country districts of the State the right to vote to have municipally owned power by voting on the question of establishing public-utility districts in the different counties. It will simply be a question of whether or not the country people of the State have sense enough to decide by their votes whether or not they want to supply themselves with municipally owned power.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

An act relating to and authorizing the establishment of public-utility districts and the consolidation thereof and annexation thereto; providing for the construction, purchase, condemnation, and purchase, acquisition, maintenance, conducting, operation, development, and regulation by such districts of certain kinds of public utilities; providing methods of payment therefor; and providing for the creation of local assessment districts by, and defining, prescribing, and regulating the powers, duties, and government of such utility districts

Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Washington:

SECTION 1. The purpose of this act is to authorize the establishment of public-utility districts, to conserve the water and power resources of the State of Washington for the benefit of the people thereof, and to supply public-utility service, including water and electricity for all uses.

SEC. 2. Municipal corporations, to be known as public-utility districts, are hereby authorized for the purposes of this act and may be established within the limits of the State of Washington as provided herein.

SEC. 3. At any general election the board of county commissioners of any county in this State may, or on petition of 10 per cent of the qualified electors of such county, based on the total vote cast in the last general county election, shall, by resolution, submit to the voters of such county the proposition of creating a public-utility district, which shall be coextensive with the limits of such county as now or hereafter established. Such petition shall be filed with the county auditor, who shall within 15 days examine the signatures thereof and certify to the sufficiency or insufficiency thereof, and for such purpose the county auditor shall have access to all registration books in the possession of election officers within such county. If such petition be found to be insufficient, it shall be returned to the persons filing the same, who may amend or add names thereto for 10 days, when the same shall be returned to the county auditor, who shall have an additional 15 days to examine the same and attach his certificate thereto. No person having signed such petition shall be allowed to withdraw his name therefrom after the filing of the same with the county auditor. Whenever such petition shall be certified to as sufficient, the county auditor shall forthwith transmit the same, together with his certificate of sufficiency attached thereto, to the board of county commissioners, who shall thereupon immediately transmit such proposition to the election board of such county, and it shall be the duty of such county election board to submit such proposition to the voters at the next general election. The notice of the election shall state the boundaries of the proposed public-utility district and the object of such election, and shall in other respects conform to the requirements of the general laws of the State of Washington governing the time and manner of holding elections. In submitting the said question to the voters for their approval or rejection the proposition shall be expressed on said ballot substantially in the following terms:

Public-utility district No. —— YES ☐
Public-utility district No. —— NO ☐

Any petition for the formation of a public-utility district may describe a less area than the entire county in which the petition is filed, the boundaries of which shall follow the then existing precinct boundaries and not divide any voting precinct; and in the event that such a petition is filed, the board of county commissioners shall fix a date for a hearing on such petition, and shall publish the petition, without the signatures thereto appended, for two weeks prior to the date of the hearing, together with a notice stating the time of the meeting when such petition will be heard. Such publication, and all other publications required by this act, shall be in a newspaper published in the proposed or established public-utility district, or, if there be no such newspaper, then in a newspaper published in the county in which such district is situated and of general circulation in such county. The hearing on such petition may be adjourned from time to time, not exceeding four weeks in all. If upon the final hearing the board of county commissioners shall find that any lands have been unjustly or improperly included within the proposed public-utility district and will not be benefited by inclusion therein, the said board shall change and fix the boundary lines in such manner as it shall deem reasonable and just and conducive to the public welfare and convenience, and make and enter an order establishing and defining the boundary lines of the proposed public-utility district: Provided, That no lands shall be included within the boundaries so fixed lying outside the boundaries described in the petition, except upon the written request of the owners of such lands. Thereafter the same procedure shall be followed as prescribed in this act for the formation of a public-utility district including an entire county," except that the petition and election shall be confined solely to the lesser public-utility district.

SEC. 4. Within five days after such election the election board of the county shall canvass the returns; and if at such election a majority of the voters voting upon such proposition shall vote in favor of the formation of such district, the election board shall so declare in its canvass of the returns of such election, and such public-utility district shall then be and become a municipal corporation of the State of Washington, and the name of such public-utility district shall be Public Utility District No. _____, of _____ County. The powers of the public-utility district shall be exercised through a commission consisting of three members, one from each of the three county commissioner districts of the county in which the public-utility district is located, when the public utility district is coextensive with the limits of such county. When the public-utility district comprises only a portion of the county, three commissioner districts, numbered consecutively, having approximately equal population and boundaries, following ward and precinct lines as far as practicable, shall be described in the petition for the formation of the public-utility district, and one commissioner shall be elected from each of said commissioner districts. No person shall be eligible to hold the office of public-utility district commissioner unless he is a qualified voter and a freeholder within such public-utility district, and is and has been a resident for a period of three years, except as hereinafter provided, of the commissioner district from which he is elected.

Public-utility district commissioners shall hold office for the term of three years, and until their respective successors are elected and qualified, each term to commence on the fourth Tuesday in March in each year in class A counties and counties of the first class, and in all other counties on the second Monday in January in each year following the election thereto. At the same election at which the proposition is submitted to the voters as to whether a public-utility district shall be formed three commissioners shall be elected, to hold office, respectively, for the term of one, two, and three years. All candidates shall be voted upon by the entire public-utility district, and the candidate residing in commissioner district No. 1 receiving the highest number of votes in the public-utility district shall hold office for the term of three years, and the candidate residing in commissioner district No. 2 receiving the highest number of votes in the public-utility district shall hold office for the term of two years, and the candidate residing in commissioner district No. 3 receiving the highest number of votes in the public-utility district shall hold office for the term of one year, each of said terms to date from the times specified in this section following the election, but also to include the period intervening between the election and the beginning of the regular terms specified in this section. All expenses of elections for the formation of such public-utility districts shall be paid by the county holding such election, and such expenditure is hereby declared to be for a county purpose, and the money paid out for such purpose shall be repaid to such county by the public-utility district, if formed. Nominations for public-utility district commissioners shall be by petition signed by 100 qualified electors of the public-utility district, to be filed in the office of the county auditor not more than 60 days and not less than 30 days prior to the day of such election: Provided, however, That in any public-utility district having a population of less than 4,000 such nominating petition shall be signed by a number of qualified electors equaling 10 per cent or more of the qualified electors of the public-utility district. A vacancy in the office of public-utility district commissioner shall occur by death, resignation, removal, conviction of a felony, non-attendance at meetings of the public-utility district commission for a period of 60 days, unless excused by the public-utility district commission, by any statutory disqualification, or by any permanent disability preventing the proper discharge of his duty. In the event of a vacancy in said office such vacancy shall be filled at the next general election, the vacancy in the interim to be filled by appointment by the remaining commissioners. If there should be at the same time such number of vacancies that there are not in office a majority of the full number of commissioners fixed by law, a special election shall be called by the county election board upon the request of the remainder, or that failing, by the county election board, such election to be held not more than 40 days after the occurring of such vacancies.

A majority of the persons holding the office of public-utility district commissioner at any time shall constitute a quorum of the commission for the transaction of business, and the concurrence of a majority of the persons holding such office at the time shall be necessary and shall be sufficient for the passage of any resolution, but no business shall be transacted unless there are in office at least a majority of the full number of commissioners fixed by law.

The boundaries of the commissioners districts shall not be changed oftener than once in four years, and only when all members of the commission are present: Provided, That any proposed change therein must be made by resolution and notice of the time of a public hearing thereon shall be published for two weeks prior thereto: And provided further, That upon a referendum petition signed by 6 per cent of the qualified voters of the public-utility district being filed with the clerk, the commission shall submit such proposed change to the voters of the public-utility district for their approval or rejection. The checking of said petition as to its sufficiency or insufficiency shall be governed by the provisions in this act relating thereto.

SEC. 5. The term "general election" as used in this act shall be held and construed to mean biennial general elections at which State and county officers are elected, and also public-utility district elections for the election of commissioners. Public-utility district elections for the election of commissioners held in Class A counties and counties of the first class shall be held on the second Tuesday in March in each year, and in all other counties on the first Saturday in December in each year. The election board of the county shall give notice of all elections held under the provisions of this act for the time and in the manner and form provided by law for city, school district, and port district elections. Whenever in the judgment of the election board of the county an emergency exists, and such board is requested so to do by a resolution of the public-utility district commission, it may call a special election at any time in such public-utility district, and at any such special election said board may combine, unite, or divide precincts for the purpose of holding such special election, and every such special election so called shall be conducted and notice thereof given in the manner provided by law.

The chairman of the board of county commissioners, the county auditor, and the prosecuting attorney of the county in which the election is held shall constitute an election board for all elections held under the provisions of this act; and it shall be the duty of such board to provide polling places for holding elections under this act, to appoint the election officers, to provide their compensation, to provide ballot boxes, and ballots or voting machines, poll books, and tally sheets, and deliver them to the election officers at the polling places, to publish and post notices of calling such elections in the manner provided by law, and to apportion to the public-utility district its share of the expense of holding such election.

The election officers appointed by the election board of the county shall conduct such elections and shall receive and deposit ballots cast thereat in a separate ballot box, and shall count said ballots and make returns thereof to the election board of the county, which board shall constitute a canvassing board for all elections held under the provisions of this act. The manner of conducting and voting at elections under this act, opening and closing of polls, keeping of poll lists, canvassing the votes, declaring the result, and certifying the returns shall be the same as provided by the general election laws governing the election of State and county officers, except as otherwise provided in this act.

The public-utility district commission shall certify to the election board a list of offices to be filled at any election to be held under the provisions of this act, and such commission, if it desires to submit to the voters of such public-utility district any proposition for their approval or adoption, or rejection, at any election held under the provisions of this act, shall require the secretary of such commission to certify the same to the election board at the time and in the manner and form now provided by law for certifying propositions to said board by the governing boards of cities, towns, and port districts.

SEC. 6. All public-utility districts organized under the provisions of this act shall have power—

(a) To make a survey of hydroelectric power, irrigation, and domestic water supply resources within or without the district, and to compile comprehensive maps and plans showing the territory that can be most economically served by the various resources and utilities, the natural order in which they should be developed, and how they may be joined and coordinated to make a complete and systematic whole.

(b) To construct, condemn and purchase, purchase, acquire, lease, add to, maintain, operate, develop, and regulate all lands, property, property rights, water, water rights, dams, ditches, flumes, aqueducts, pipes and pipe lines, water power, leases, easements, rights of way, franchises, plants, plant facilities and systems for generating electric energy by water power, steam, or other methods, plant, plant facilities and systems for developing, conserving, and distributing water for domestic use and irrigation, buildings, structures, poles and pole lines, and cables and conduits and any and all other facilities, and to exercise the right of eminent domain to effectuate the foregoing purposes or for the acquisition and damaging of the same or property of any kind appurtenant thereto, and for the purpose of acquiring the right to make physical connection with plants and plant facilities of any and all persons, corporations, and municipalities, and such right of eminent domain shall be exercised and instituted pursuant to resolution of the commission and conducted in the same manner and by the same procedure as is or may be provided by law for the exercise of the power of eminent domain by incorporated cities and towns of the State of Washington in the acquisition of like property and property rights. It shall be no defense to a condemnation proceeding hereunder that a portion of the electric current generated or sold by such public-utility district will be applied to private purposes provided the principal uses intended are public: Provided, That no public utility owned by a city or town shall be condemned hereunder, and none shall be purchased without submission of the question to the voters of the utility district. In any condemnation proceeding under this act the court shall submit to the jury the values placed upon such property by the county assessor or other taxing authority for taxation purposes, and in respect to property, plants, and facilities of persons and corporations using public highways for the furnishing of public service without franchises, shall consider in determining the value thereof the fact that such property, plants, and facilities are subject to be removed from such highways by reason of being so operated without such franchises.

(c) To construct, purchase, condemn and purchase, acquire, add to, maintain, conduct and operate water works and irrigation plants and systems, within or without its limits, for the purpose of furnishing such public-utility district, and the inhabitants thereof, and any other persons, including public and private corporations within or without its limits, with an ample supply of water for all uses and purposes, public and private, including water power, domestic use and irrigation, with full and exclusive authority to sell and regulate and control the use, distribution, and price thereof.

(d) To purchase, within or without its limits, electric current for sale and distribution, within or without its limits, and to construct, condemn and purchase, purchase, acquire, add to, maintain, conduct and operate works, plants, transmission and distribution lines, and facilities for generating electric current, operated either by water power, steam, or other methods, within or without its limits, for the purpose of furnishing said public-utility district, and the inhabitants thereof, and any other persons, including public and private corporations, within or without its limits, with electric current for all uses, with full and exclusive authority to sell and regulate and control the use, distribution, rates, service, charges, and price thereof, free from the jurisdiction and control of the director of public works, and division of public utilities, in all things, together with the right to purchase, handle, sell, or lease motors, lamps, transformers, and any and all other kinds of equipment and accessories of every nature and kind whatsoever necessary and convenient for the use, distribution, and sale thereof: Provided, That the commission shall not supply water to a privately owned utility for the production of electric energy, and may supply, directly or indirectly, to privately owned public utilities which sell electric energy or water to the public, any of the surplus electric energy or water under its control, and contracts therefor shall not extend over a longer period than three years: Provided, That it must at all times first make adequate provision for the needs of the district, both actual and prospective.

(e) And for the purposes aforesaid, it shall be lawful for any public-utility district so organized to take, condemn and purchase, purchase, and acquire any and all public and private property, franchises, and property rights, including State, county, and school lands, and property and littoral and water rights, for any of the purposes aforesaid, and for railroads, tunnels, pipe lines, aqueducts, transmission lines, and any and all other facilities necessary or convenient, and, in connection with the construction, maintenance, or operation of any such utility or utilities, to acquire by purchase or condemnation and purchase, the right to divert, take, retain and impound and use water from or in any lake or watercourse regardless of whether such lake or watercourse or the water therein be public or private, navigable or nonnavigable, or held, owned, or used by the State, or any subdivision thereof, or by any person or corporation for any public or private use, proprietary or governmental, or any underflowing water within the State; and such public-utility district is hereby authorized and empowered to erect and build, within or without its limits, dams or other works across any river or watercourse, or across or at the outlet of any lake, up to and above high-water mark; and, for the purpose of constructing or laying aqueducts or pipe lines, dams, or waterworks, or other necessary structures in storing, retaining, and distributing water as above provided, or for any of the purposes provided for by this act, such public-utility district shall have the right to occupy and use the beds and shores up to the high-water mark of any such lake, river, or watercourse and to acquire by purchase or by condemnation and purchase, or otherwise, any water, water rights, easements, or privileges named in this act or necessary for any of said purposes, and any such public-utility district shall have the right to acquire by purchase or condemnation and purchase, or otherwise, any lands, property, or privileges necessary to be had to protect the water supply of such public-utility district from pollution: Provided, That should private property be necessary for any such purposes, or for storing water above high-water mark, such public-utility district may condemn and purchase or purchase and acquire such private property. Such public-utility district shall have power to build and maintain intertie lines connecting its power plant and distribution system with the power plant and distribution system owned by any other public-utility district, or municipal corporation, or to connect with the power plants and distribution systems owned by any municipal corporation in the district, and from any such intertie line to sell electric energy to any individual, or public-utility district, or any city or town, or other corporations, public or private, and, by means of transmission or pole lines, to conduct electric energy from the place of production to the point of distribution, and to construct and lay said aqueducts, pipe or pole lines, and transmission lines along and upon public highways, roads, and streets, and to condemn and purchase, purchase, or acquire lands, franchises, and rights of way necessary for the same.

(f) To contract indebtedness or borrow money for corporate purposes on the credit of the corporation or the revenues of the public utilities thereof, and to issue general obligation or utility bonds therefor, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 6 per cent per annum, payable semiannually, said bonds not to be sold for less than par and accrued interest; to purchase with surplus funds local utility district bonds of districts created by the commission and sell the same, giving preference to residents of the district, and to create a revolving fund to insure the prompt payment of all local utility district bonds.

(g) To raise revenue by the levy of an annual tax on all taxable property within such public utility district not exceeding 2 mills in any one year, exclusive of interest and redemption for general obligation bonds. The commission shall prepare a proposed budget of the contemplated financial transactions for the ensuing year and file the same in the records of the commission on or before the first Monday in September. Notice of the filing of said proposed budget and the date and place of hearing on the same shall be published for at least two consecutive weeks in a newspaper printed and of general circulation in said county. On the first Monday in October the commission shall hold a public hearing on said proposed budget, at which any taxpayer may appear and be heard against the whole or any part of the proposed budget. Upon the conclusion of said hearing the commission shall, by resolution, adopt the budget as finally determined, and fix the final amount of expenditures for the ensuing year. Taxes levied by the commission shall be certified to and collected by the proper county officer of the county in which such public utility district is located in the same manner as is or may be provided by law for the certification and collection of port district taxes. The commission is authorized, prior to the receipt of taxes raised by levy, to borrow money or issue warrants of the district in anticipation of the revenue to be derived by such district from the levy of taxes for the purpose of such district, and such warrants shall be redeemed from the first money available from such taxes when collected, and such warrants shall not exceed the anticipated revenue of one year, and shall bear interest at a rate of not to exceed 6 per cent per annum.

(h) To enter into any contract with the United States Government, or any State, municipality, or other utility district, or any department of those governing bodies for carrying out any of the powers authorized by this act.

(i) To acquire by gift, devise, bequest, lease, or purchase real and personal property necessary or convenient for the purposes of the district or any local district therein.

(j) To make contracts, employ engineers, attorneys, and other technical or professional assistance; to print and publish information or literature and to do all other things necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

The public-utility district commission shall appoint a manager, who shall be appointed for an indefinite time and be removable at the will of the commission. Appointments and removals shall be by resolution, introduced at a regular meeting and adopted at a subsequent regular meeting by a majority vote. He shall receive such salary as the commission shall fix by resolution.

The manager shall be the chief administrative officer of the public-utility district, and shall have control of administrative functions of the district, and shall be responsible to the commission for the efficient administration of all the affairs of the district placed in his charge. He shall be an experienced executive with administrative ability. In case of the absence or temporary disability of the manager, he shall, with the approval of the president of the commission, designate some competent person as acting manager.

The manager shall be entitled to attend all meetings of the commission and its committees, and to take part in the discussion of any matters pertaining to the duties of his department, but shall have no vote.

The public-utility district manager shall have power, and it shall be his duty:

To carry out the orders of the commission, and to see that all the laws of the State pertaining to matters within the functions of his department are duly enforced.

To keep the commission fully advised as to the financial condition and needs of the district. To prepare, each year, an estimate for the ensuing fiscal year of the probable expenses of his department, and to recommend to the commission what development work should be undertaken, and what extensions and additions, if any, should be made, during the ensuing fiscal year, with an estimate of the costs of such development work, extensions, and additions. To certify to the commission all bills, allowances, and pay rolls, including claims due contractors of public works. To recommend to the commission salaries of the employees of his office, and a scale of salaries or wages to be paid for the different classes of service required by the district. To hire and discharge clerks, laborers, and other employees under his direction. To perform such other duties as may be imposed upon him by resolution of the commission. It shall be unlawful for him to make any contribution of money in aid of or in opposition to the election of any candidate for public-utility commissioner or to advocate or oppose any such election.

(k) To sue and be sued in any court of competent jurisdiction: Provided, That all suits against the public-utility district shall be brought in the county in which the public-utility district is located. No suit for damages shall be maintained against such public-utility district except on the basis of a claim therefor filed with the commission of such district complying in all respects with the terms and requirement for claims for damages filed pursuant to general law against cities of the second class.

(l) By resolution to establish and define the boundaries of local assessment districts to be known as local utility district No. —— for the distribution, under the general supervision and control of the commission, of water for domestic use and/or irrigation and/or electric energy, and in like manner to provide for the purchasing, or otherwise acquiring or constructing and equipping distribution systems for said purposes and for extensions and betterments thereof, and to levy and collect in accordance with the special benefits conferred thereon, special assessments and reassessments on property specially benefited thereby, for paying the cost and expense of the same, or any portions thereof, as herein provided, and to issue local improvement bonds and/or warrants to be repaid wholly or in part by collection of local improvement assessments.

The commission shall by resolution establish the method of procedure in all matters relating to local utility districts. Any public-utility district may determine by resolution what work shall be done or improvements made at the expense, in whole or in part, of the property specially benefited thereby; and to adopt and provide the manner, machinery, and proceedings in any way relating to the making and collecting assessments therefor in pursuance of this act. Except as herein otherwise provided, or as may hereafter be set forth by resolution, all matters and proceedings relating to the local utility district, the levying and collection of assessments, the issuance and redemption of local improvement warrants and bonds, and the enforcement of local assessment liens hereunder, shall be governed, as nearly as may be, by the laws relating to local improvements for cities of the first class: Provided, That no protest against a local utility district improvement shall be received by the commission after 12 o'clock noon of the day set for hearing.

Any improvement authorized by this act may be ordered only by resolution of the commission either upon petition or resolution therefor. Whenever a petition, signed by 10 per cent of the owners of land in the district to be therein described shall be filed with the commission, asking that the plan or improvement therein set forth be adopted and ordered and defining the boundaries of a local improvement district to be assessed in whole or in part to pay the cost thereof, it shall be the duty of the commission to fix the date of hearing on such petition and give not less than two weeks' notice thereof by publication. The commission may, in its discretion, deny such petition or order the improvement unless a majority of the owners of lands in said district shall file prior to 12 o'clock noon of the day of said hearing with secretary thereof a petition protesting against said improvement; and if the commission shall order the improvement, then it may alter the boundaries of such proposed district and prepare and adopt detail plans of any such local improvement, declare the estimated cost thereof, what proportion of such cost shall be borne by such local improvement district, and what proportion of the cost, if any, shall be borne by the entire public-utility district. Whenever such a petition signed by a majority of the landowners in such a proposed local improvement district shall be filed with the commission, asking that the improvement therein described be ordered, the commission shall forthwith fix a date for hearing on said petition, after which the commission must, by resolution, order such improvement, and may alter the boundaries of such proposed district, prepare and adopt such improvement, prepare and adopt detail plans thereof, declare the estimated cost thereof, what proportion of such cost shall be borne by such proposed local improvement district, and what proportion of the cost, if any, shall be borne by the entire public-utility district, and provide the general funds thereof to be applied thereto, if any, acquire all lands and other properties therefor, pay all damages caused thereby, and commence in the name of the public-utility district such eminent domain proceedings and supplemental assessments or reassessment proceedings to pay all eminent domain awards as may be necessary to entitle said district to proceed with such work, and shall thereafter proceed with such work, and shall make and file with the county treasurer its roll levying special assessments in the amount to be paid by special assessment against the property situated within such local improvement district in proportion to the special benefits to be derived by the property in such local improvement district from such improvement. Before the approval of such roll, a notice shall be published 10 days stating that such roll is on file and open to inspection in the office of secretary of the district and fixing a time not less than 15 days nor more than 30 days from the date of the first publication of such notice within which protests must be filed with secretary of said district against any assessments shown thereon, and fixing a time when a hearing shall be held by said commission on said protests. After such hearing the commission may alter any and all assessments shown on such roll and may then, by resolution, approve the same; but if any assessment be raised a new notice similar to such first notice shall be given and a hearing had thereon, after which final approval of such roll may be made by the commission. Any person feeling aggrieved by such assessments shall perfect an appeal to the superior court of such county within 10 days after such approval in the manner now provided by law for appeals from assessments levied by cities of the first class in this State. Engineering, office, and other expenses necessary or incident to said improvement shall be borne by the public-utility district: Provided, That where any municipal corporation included within such public-utility district already owns or operates a utility of like character for which such assessments are levied hereunder then all such engineering and other expenses mentioned above shall be borne by the local assessment district.

Whenever any improvement shall be ordered hereunder, payment for which shall be made in part from assessments against property specially benefited, not more than 50 per cent of the cost thereof shall ever be borne by the entire public-utility district, nor shall any sum be contributed by it to any improvement acquired or constructed with or by any other body, exceed such amount, unless a majority of the electors of such district shall consent to or ratify the making of such expenditure.

(m) It is, and shall be lawful for any public-utility district organized hereunder to sell and convey all the works, plants, systems, utilities, and properties authorized by this act and owned by it after proceedings had as required by sections 9512, 9513, and 9514 of Remington's Compiled Statutes of Washington: Provided, That three-fifths of the voters voting for such sale, in lieu of a majority, shall be necessary. Public-utility districts shall be held to be municipal corporations within the meaning of said sections and the commission of such public-utility district shall be held to be the legislative body within the meaning of said sections, and the president and secretary of such district shall have the same powers and perform the same duties as the mayor and city clerk referred to in said sections, and the resolutions of the public-utility districts shall be held to mean ordinance within the meaning of said sections.

(n) The commission of each public-utility district may adopt general resolutions to carry out the purposes, objects, and provisions of this act.

SEC. 7. Whenever the commission shall deem it advisable that the public-utility district purchase, purchase and condemn, acquire, or construct any such public utility, or make any additions or betterments thereto, or extensions thereof, the commission shall provide therefor by resolution, which shall specify and adopt the system or plan proposed, and declare the estimated cost thereof, as near as may be, and specify whether general or utility indebtedness is to be incurred, the amount of such indebtedness, the amount of interest, and the time in which all general bonds, if any, shall be paid, not to exceed 30 years. In the event the proposed general indebtedness to be incurred will bring the indebtedness of the public-utility district to an amount exceeding 1½ per cent of the taxable property of the public-utility district, the proposition of incurring such indebtedness and the proposed plan or system shall be submitted to the qualified electors of said public-utility district for their assent at the next general election held in such public-utility district.

Whenever the commission (or a majority of the qualified voters of such public-utility district, voting at said election, when it is necessary to submit the same to said voters) shall have adopted a system or plan for any such public utility as aforesaid, and shall have authorized indebtedness therefor by a three-fifths vote of the qualified voters of such district, voting at said election, general or public-utility bonds may be used as hereinafter provided. Said general bonds shall be serial in form and maturity and numbered from 1 upward consecutively. The various annual maturities shall commence not later than the tenth year after the date of issue of such bonds. The resolution authorizing the issuance of the bonds shall fix the rate of interest the bonds shall bear, said interest not to exceed 6 per cent, and the place and rate of the payment of both principal and interest. The bonds shall be signed by the president of the commission, attested by the secretary of the commission, and the seal of the public-utility district shall be affixed to each bond but not to the coupon: Provided, however, That said coupon, in lieu of being so signed, may have printed thereon a facsimile of the signature of such officers. The principal and interest of such general bonds shall be paid from the revenue of such public-utility district after deducting costs of maintenance, operation, and expenses of the public-utility district, and any deficit in the payment of principal and interest of said general bonds shall be paid by levying each year a tax upon the taxable property within said district sufficient to pay said interest and principal of said bonds, which tax shall be due and collectible as any other tax. Said bonds shall be sold in such manner as the commission shall deem for the best interest of the district. All bonds and warrants issued under the authority of this act shall be legal securities, which may be used by any bank or trust company for deposit with the State treasurer or any county or city treasurer as security for deposits in lieu of a surety bond under any law relating to deposits of public moneys. When the commission shall not desire to incur a general indebtedness in the purchase, condemnation and purchase, acquisition, or construction of any such public utility, or addition or betterment thereto, or extension thereof, it shall have the power to create a special fund or funds for the sole purpose of defraying the cost of such public utility, or addition or betterment thereto or extension thereof, into which special fund or funds it may obligate and bind the district to set aside and pay a fixed proportion of the gross revenues of such public utility, or any fixed amount out of and not exceeding a fixed proportion of such revenues, or a fixed amount without regard to any fixed proportion, and to issue and sell bonds or warrants bearing interest not exceeding 6 per cent per annum, payable semiannually, executed in such manner and payable at such times and places as the commission shall determine, but such bonds or warrants and the interest thereon shall be payable only out of such special fund or funds. In creating any such special fund or funds the commission shall have due regard to the cost of operation and maintenance of the plant or system as constructed or added to, and to any proportion or part of the revenues previously pledged as a fund for the payment of bonds or warrants, and shall not set aside into such special fund or funds a greater amount or proportion of the revenues and proceeds than, in its judgment, will be available over and above such cost of maintenance and operation and the amount or proportion, if any, of the revenues so previously pledged. Any such bonds or warrants and interest thereon issued against any such fund, as herein provided, shall be a valid claim of the holder thereof only as against the said special fund and its fixed proportion or amount of the revenue pledged to such fund, and shall not constitute an indebtedness of such district within the meaning of the constitutional provisions and limitations. Each such bond or warrant shall state on its face that it is payable from a special fund, naming such fund and the resolution creating it. Said bonds and warrants shall be sold in such manner as the commission shall deem for the best interests of the district, and the commission may provide in any contract for the construction and acquisition of a proposed improvement or utility that payment therefor shall be made only in such bonds or warrants at the par value thereof. In all other respects the issuance of such utility bonds or warrants and payment therefor shall be governed by the public utility laws for cities and towns.

SEC. 8. The commissioners shall serve without compensation. No resolution shall be adopted without a majority vote of the whole commission. The commission shall organize by the election of its own members of a president and secretary, shall by resolution adopt rules governing the transaction of its business, and shall adopt an official seal. All proceedings of the commission shall be by motion or resolution recorded in a book or books kept for such purpose, which shall be public records. The county treasurer of the county in which such district is situated shall be the treasurer of the district, and all funds of the district shall be paid to him as such treasurer and shall only be disbursed by him on warrants drawn and signed by an auditor to be appointed by the commission upon order of or vouchers approved by the commission. The commission shall have authority to create and fill such positions and fix salaries and bonds thereof as it may by resolution provide.

All materials purchased and work ordered, the estimated cost of which is in excess of $5,000, shall be by contract. Before awarding any such contract the commission shall cause to be published a notice at least 30 days before the letting of said contract inviting sealed proposals for such work, plans, and specifications which must at the time of the publication of such notice be on file at the office of the public-utility district, subject to public inspection: Provided, however, That the commission may at the same time, and as part of the same notice, invite tenders for said work or materials upon plans and specifications to be submitted by bidders. Such notice shall state generally the work to be done, and shall call for proposals for doing the same, to be sealed and filed with the commission on or before the day and hour named therein. Each bid shall be accompanied by a certified check, payable to the order of the commission, for a sum not less than 5 per cent of amount of the bid, and no bid shall be considered unless accompanied by such check. At the time and place named such bids shall be publicly opened and read, and the commission shall proceed to canvass the bids, and may let such contract to the lowest responsible bidder upon plans and specifications on file, or to the best bidder submitting his own plans and specifications: Provided, however, That no contract shall be let in excess of the estimated cost of said materials or work, or if, in the opinion of the commission, all bids are unsatisfactory, they may reject all of them and readvertise, and in such case all checks shall be returned to the bidders; but if such contract be let, then and in such case, all checks shall be returned to the bidders except that of the successful bidder, which shall be retained until a contract shall be entered into for the purchase of such materials for doing such work, and a bond to perform such work furnished, with sureties satisfactory to the commission, in an amount to be fixed by the commission, not less than 25 per cent of contract price in any case, between the bidder and commission, in accordance with the bid. If such bidder fails to enter into said contract in accordance with said bid and furnish such bond within 10 days from the date at which he is notified that he is the successful bidder, the said check and the amount thereof shall be forfeited to the public-utility district.

Every contractor and subcontractor performing any work for said public-utility districts or local utility districts within said public-utility district shall pay or cause to be paid to its employees on such work or under such contract or subcontract not less than the minimum scale fixed by the resolution of the commission prior to the notice and call for bids on such work. The commission, in fixing such minimum scale of wages shall fix the same as nearly as possible to the current prevailing and going wages within the district for work of like character.

SEC. 9. The county treasurer of the county in which is located any public-utility district shall be ex officio treasurer of any public-utility district in such county, and he shall create a fund for any public-utility district to be known as public-utility district fund, into which shall be paid all money received by him from the collection of taxes in behalf of such public-utility district, and he shall also maintain such other special funds as may be created by the public-utility commission, into which shall be placed such moneys as the public-utility commission may by its resolution direct.

All such public-utility district funds shall be deposited with the county depositories under the same restrictions, contracts, and security as is provided by statute for county depositories, and all interest collected on such public-utility funds shall belong to such public-utility district and be deposited to its credit in the proper public-utility district funds.

SEC. 10. Two or more contiguous public-utility districts may become consolidated into one public-utility district after proceedings had as required by sections 8909, 8910, and 8911 of Remington's Compiled Statutes of Washington: Provided, That a 10 per cent petition shall be sufficient; and public-utility districts shall be held to be municipal corporations within the meaning of said sections, and the commission shall be held to be the legislative body of the public-utility district as the term legislative body is used in said sections: Provided, That any such consolidation shall in no wise affect or impair the title to any property owned or held by any such public-utility district, or in trust therefor, or any debts, demands, liabilities, or obligations existing in favor of or against either of the districts so consolidated, or any proceeding then pending: Provided further, That no property within either of the former public-utility districts shall ever be taxed to pay any of the indebtedness of either of the other such former districts.

The boundaries of any public-utility district may be enlarged and new territory included therein, after proceedings had as required by section 8894 of Remington's Compiled Statutes of Washington: Provided, That a 10 per cent petition shall be sufficient; and public-utility districts shall be held to be municipal corporations within the meaning of said section, and the commission shall be held to be the legislative body of the public-utility district: Provided, That no property within such territory so annexed shall ever be taxed to pay any portion of any indebtedness of such public-utility district contracted prior to or existing at the date of such annexation.

In all cases wherein public-utility districts of less area than an entire county desire to be consolidated with a public-utility district including an entire county, and in all cases wherein it is desired to enlarge a public-utility district including an entire county by annexing a lesser area than an entire county, no election shall be required to be held in the district including an entire county.

SEC. 11. Adjudication of invalidity of any section, clause, or part of a section of this act shall not impair or otherwise affect the validity of the act as a whole or any other part thereof.

The rule of strict construction shall have no application to this act, but the same shall be liberally construed, in order to carry out the purposes and objects for which this act is intended.

When this act comes in conflict with any provision, limitation, or restriction in any other law, this act shall govern and control.

SEC. 12. This act shall not be deemed or construed to repeal or affect any existing act, or any part thereof relating to the construction, operation, and maintenance of public utilities by irrigation or water districts or other municipal corporations, but shall be supplemental thereto and concurrent herewith. No public-utility district created hereunder shall include therein any municipal corporation, or any part thereof, where such municipal corporation already owns or operates all the utilities herein authorized: Provided, That in case it does not own or operate all such utilities it may be included within such public-utility district for the purpose of establishing or operating therein such utilities as it does not own or operate: Provided further, That no property situated within any irrigation or water district or other municipal corporations shall ever be taxed or assessed to pay for any utility, or part thereof, of like character to any utility owned or operated by such irrigation or water districts or other municipal corporations.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, will the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] yield to me for about five minutes to submit a few remarks before he proceeds?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from New Mexico for that purpose?

Mr. JOHNSON. I shall be glad to do so, provided the Senator does not occupy more than that length of time.

Mr. CUTTING. I assure the Senator I shall not do so.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well.

OIL-LAND LEASES

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, there began yesterday in Colorado Springs a conference of the governors of the oil-producing States of the Union, called to consider matters of vital national importance. The conference was called by the President of the United States, and, after being opened by the Secretary of the Interior, the chairmanship of the meeting was turned over to Mr. Mark L. Requa. I do not know what took place in that meeting beyond what is reported this morning by the Associated Press. I quote from their dispatch as follows:

An initial attempt at the governors' oil-conservation conference here to obtain action on a resolution favoring rescinding of President Hoover's order barring further prospecting on the public lands fell short to-night when Chairman Mark L. Requa ruled a resolution to that effect out of order.

This was the conference called by the administration to consider all matters concerning in any way the conservation of oil. I challenge the right of Mr. Mark L. Requa or of anyone else to prevent the discussion by the governors or representatives of the sovereign States involved of any matter pertinent to the issue before that conference.

I quote further from the Associated Press dispatch:

If and when the Government has made it possible for the industry to cooperate and conserve—and that cooperation and conservation is not forthcoming, then acting in behalf of national need, no one will be more insistent than myself in urging rigid Government coercive regulation.

Said Mr. Requa—

The resolution which I understand was sponsored by the Governor of Wyoming dealt with the presidential order of March last concerning the administration of the 1920 leasing act. If that was not germane to the issue before the conference, I can not conceive what matters could be considered germane.

If the 1920 leasing act has outlived its value and its usefulness, it is the duty of the Congress to deal with the matter and provide an alternative which shall be better. I believe a resolution on this subject is at present before the Committee on the Judiciary and I do not want to comment on it further.

I will say, however, that the kind of conference which summons the governors and representatives of nine sovereign States before it and says to them, first, "Anything which you may say which does not agree with the policy of the administration is out of order," and which then goes on to say, "If your deliberations do not produce a result gratifying to the administration, we shall use coercion," is not one, in my opinion, which will further a really satisfactory settlement of the oil situation.

Speaking for New Mexico, and I hope for the other Rocky Mountain States, a policy of coercion will be bitterly resented and repudiated.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield to me for a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] has just addressed himself to a question, the importance and significance of which I am afraid, the Senate does not appreciate. The President has spoken much in regard to law enforcement and obedience to the law. All patriotic citizens accept the view that constitutional laws should be observed. The Constitution of the United States confers upon Congress exclusive authority to dispose of and make rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property belonging to the United States. It does not give this authority to the President of the United States or to any executive branch of the Government.

Pursuant to this authority Congress in 1920 enacted a law "to promote the mining of phosphate, oil, coal, gas, and sodium in the public domain." Section 1 of the act provides that the minerals mentioned in the act "shall be subject to disposition in the form and manner provided by the act."

The law was enacted, not for the purpose of locking up oil, coal, and other minerals, or conferring upon the Executive the discretion to prevent the development of mineral lands or the disposition of the lands referred to in the act.

Congress did not intend to give nor did it give to the President or the Secretary of the Interior authority to dispose of oil or gas or coal lands. The law contemplated that these lands should be disposed of under the terms of the act. The President of the United States on the 12th day of March of this year made a statement, which has been regarded as an Executive order, which I submit was in violation of the letter and the spirit of the leasing act referred to. It was in effect an attempt to nullify the act of 1920 and to interfere with the rights of thousands of American citizens who were seeking to obtain leases and permits to develop oil lands upon the public domain under the provisions of the act of 1920. In my opinion the President's act was unwarranted, unauthorized, and invalid. The Secretary of the Interior, pursuant to the order of the President, took steps to execute the same; and, abdicating any discretion which he had in the matter of granting permits, ordered the return of applications for permits to thousands of American citizens, and issued other orders, which were ex post facto in character and abridged the vested rights of thousands of other citizens of the United States.

Mr. President, I condemn the course of the President and the Secretary of the Interior in their efforts to set aside an act of Congress. In my opinion their course constitutes a denial of the rights of American citizens and is an attempt to nullify an important law of the land.

Congress, after years of investigation and consideration of the question of dealing with coal, oil, gas, and certain other mineral lands, enacted the leasing act of 1920. The House committee, in reporting the bill in the Sixty-fifth Congress, third session, declared that the measure "was for the development of the West and of the resources of the West." They further stated that the measure in question "will keep open and develop the West and break the deadlock which had existed since the withdrawals of 1909."

Under this law leases have been granted for the development of the minerals embraced in this act and found upon the public domain. Tens of millions of dollars have been expended in this development and in geological explorations for the discovery of minerals upon the public domain. Many citizens have expended large sums in their efforts to discover oil and gas, preliminary to applying for permits. Thousands of applications for permits had been made prior to the date of the President's order and thousands were pending in the various land offices and in the Interior Department on the 12th day of March of this year. I shall not trespass upon the Senator's time to explain the full effects of the action of the President and the Secretary of the Interior, and the serious consequences which have followed and the enormous losses which have been sustained by persons who, in good faith, complied with the law.

A conference of the oil producers of the United States has been called, as I understand, by the President, and it is now meeting in Colorado. Many of the large oil operators have been attempting to secure Executive approval for the organization of further trusts and combinations, ostensibly in the interest of conservation, but in reality to enable them to charge higher prices for crude oil and its derivatives. This conference, in my opinion, is largely in the interest of some plan or scheme that will tend to the creation of a monopoly by the large oil producers in the United States. The various Standard Oil Corporations, the Gulf Refining Co., and other large producing organizations, have their representatives at the Colorado conference, and the press reports referred to by the Senator from New Mexico indicate that they are seeking the adoption of a policy to restrict production with, of course, the ultimate object of securing higher prices for all oil products.

Mr. Mark Requa apparently is the representative of the Executive, and it would seem that the Federal Government is backing the plan suggested by Mr. Requa, who threatens coercive measures against the States if some agreement is not reached in harmony with the purposes of the great oil producers of the United States. There is now an Oil Trust in the United States, and the profits of some members of this trust are already stupendous. The Oil and Gas Journal, under date of January 31, 1929, reports that the dividend record of the Standard Oil group for the year 1928 totals $222,331,221. Authentic reports indicate that the production of oil and its various by-products scarcely keeps pace with the requirements of the country, and that had it not been for imports the domestic production would have been insufficient to meet domestic needs.

Mr. President, in my opinion, some of the purposes of the conference are improper and purely selfish. I regret that the administration is strengthening the hands of those who are seeking an oil monopoly; it is certain that the illegal order of the President and the orders of the Secretary of the Interior pursuant thereto, will contribute to the monopoly sought, and prove of serious injury not only to the public land States but to the American people.

I offered a resolution a few weeks ago, which is now before the Judiciary Committee of the Senate. This resolution seeks the judgment of the committee as to the validity of the act of the President and the orders of the Secretary of the Interior pursuant thereto. I shall seek an early opportunity to discuss this resolution and the causes leading to its introduction.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California has the floor.

Mr. BURTON. Will the Senator from California yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will announce that if the Senator from California yields for speeches he will lose the floor, and the Chair will hereafter enforce the rule.

Mr. JOHNSON. I recognize that I can not yield for a speech.

Mr. BURTON. I desire only a moment.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator from Ohio will have to pardon me, because the Vice President has just said that if I yield for a speech I shall lose the floor, and I do not want to lose the floor. I will yield for the presentation of a memorial or anything of that sort.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. JOHNSON. I can not yield for a speech.

Mr. BRATTON. I do not intend to transgress upon the rights of the Senator. I simply wish to observe that at the conclusion of his remarks I shall desire to submit some observations in connection with the same subject matter to which my colleague the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] and the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] have addressed themselves.

FARM RELIEF—CONFERENCE REPORT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1) to establish a Federal farm board to promote the effective merchandising of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce, and to place agriculture on a basis of economic equality with other industries.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I wish to address myself rather briefly this morning to some phases of the conference report on the farm relief bill and to the question which has been in controversy in the Senate during the past few months. The debate yesterday threatened to take something of a sinister course at one time, as voiced upon this floor during that debate were some of the animadversions that we have read expressed in the press of the Nation since the vote was had upon the farm relief bill.

I want to make plain to-day the sequence of events concerning the farm relief bill. I want to leave in every man's mind upon this side of the Chamber an accurate history of what has transpired in relation to farm relief. Then I want to leave with my brethren here the problem of whether they stand as they and I stood last year, as they and I have stood in years gone by, or whether to-day, in connection with the debenture provision which recently was adopted by the Senate, they desire to change entirely the stand that was theirs for years in the past, and that is the stand to-day of certain of those who sit upon this side of the Chamber.

Do you realize, Mr. President, what the bill is that constitutes to-day what is termed the administration bill? It is the Jardine bill of a year or two ago. Do you realize that in the report of the Committee on Agriculture the bill is actually and accurately described as the Jardine bill, which was presented to the Congress of the United States a year or two ago as a bill which should take the place of the relief measure then pending before the Committees on Agriculture of the two Houses? Do you realize also that interlocked with the Jardine bill there is a sort of irony of fate? The bill which to-day it is asserted, upon pain of the displeasure of a united, servile, hypocritical, and subservient press of the Nation, that we must pass else we shall have done something which will return to plague us in the days to come, is the old Jardine bill without the debenture clause.

That bill was not only repudiated by every farming section in this Nation when it was presented but was repudiated by the Congress of the United States and by both the Agricultural Committees of that Congress. It is the bill, indeed, which made the poor former Secretary of Agriculture so unpopular in the farming districts of the Nation that it was impossible for him to continue in his activity as Secretary of Agriculture. Notwithstanding he was one of the original men who fought the fight in behalf of the Republican candidate for President, he was denied a continuance in his office because the Jardine bill had rendered him so unpopular all over the land and had been so generally and universally repudiated that it made him inappropriate from the popular standpoint longer to fulfill the office and perform the duties of Secretary of Agriculture. It is the irony of fate that to-day that is the bill stripped of the debenture clause which it is asserted we must pass at all hazards and concerning which it is asserted that we must not have any opinions or present any amendments on pain of having no farm relief at all. So much for the genesis of the bill.

Then what? Before the Agricultural Committees of the Senate and the House there have been farm relief bills pending for eight long years. No committees with more painstaking care, with greater industry, with greater ability, ever considered legislation. The Committee on Agriculture of the Senate, sitting during the interval before the extra session and thereafter, continued the investigations which have been so well made by that committee in the years gone by. It proceeded with the taking of testimony; it continued its work, and finally there came to the committee sitting as the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate of the United States the debenture clause. It appealed to the Agricultural Committee—not to one member or another, not to a Democratic member or a single individual Republican member, but it appealed to the unanimous judgment of the entire Agricultural Committee of the United States Senate.

Talk to me about politics in the vote that has been given by certain unafraid men upon this side upon this bill! Politics! Why, the Republican Party, as represented in the Agricultural Committee of the United States Senate, unanimously, when it was presented to it, indorsed the debenture provision that is contained in the bill on which we in the Senate voted and which we passed. Every single man upon that committee, Republican and Democrat alike, was for that bill and for the debenture clause.

Then what occurred? After, with unanimity having their judgments convinced of the availability and desirability of the debenture clause, the thought occurred to some upon the committee that it might not be entirely pleasing to the President of the United States—and that was appropriate, of course, for them thus to consider—to pass a bill containing the debenture clause. Then a subcommittee was appointed by the Agricultural Committee to take up the matter with the President. That subcommittee called upon the President, presented to him frankly its view, and asked his. So far as I am able to ascertain from what has been said upon the floor here, the subcommittee was advised by the President that he had substantially at that particular moment no opinion upon the subject, but referred the subcommittee and the Committee on Agriculture to the experts of the Agricultural Department—a perfectly legitimate thing and a perfectly proper thing, of course, to do. Thereafter the Committee on Agriculture called before it the experts of the Agricultural Department and listened to the testimony of those experts upon the debenture plan, and after the experts of the Agricultural Department, presided over by the President's Secretary of Agriculture and under the command of the present President of the United States, had testified before the Agricultural Committee, the Agricultural Committee of the United States Senate unanimously voted to report this bill with the debenture clause in it.

Politics in the action of the Senate! A desire to embarrass the President or somebody else! What politics could possibly be in a bill that was presented with absolute unanimity by the Agricultural Committee of the Senate after the experts of the Agricultural Department had testified and after the President of the United States had been consulted upon the matter?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I hesitate to interrupt the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am very glad to be interrupted.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator is so just and uniformly fair about matters under consideration in the Senate that I am sure he is not in full possession of the facts in this instance. When the debenture provision came before the Senate Committee on Agriculture I said specifically a great number of times that I was opposed to the debenture in principle; but, in order to report a bill, I voted to report the bill containing the debenture clause, reserving the right to oppose it on the floor of the Senate. That was also the state of mind of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. THOMAS]. There was no influence used in any way whatsoever, but we carried out the principle which we had said beforehand we had in our minds.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I, of course, accept the correction of the Senator from Oregon; but may I be pardoned the suggestion that the bill which came to us here with a unanimous report, with the debenture plan in it, probably would have found no opposition in this Chamber if there had been no letter written by the President?

May I inquire from the Senator from Oregon: Suppose the President had not written his famous letter to the Senator in which he expressed his opinion upon the debenture plan, would not the bill have gone through with the debenture plan in it, and practically without opposition from the committee?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I do not speak or attempt to speak for any other Member of this body. I have been in principle against the debenture plan for years; and, for one, I would have opposed it and voted against it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I recall the opening statement of the Senator from Oregon. I do not wish to quote it now from memory. I will obtain it during the course of the day; but, if I am not in error, in the opening argument that was presented by the Senator from Oregon upon this subject he said in so many words that the debenture probably would do the job; and, so far as I recall, there never was an objection voiced in his remarks to the debenture except upon the theory, and the perfectly legitimate theory, that with the debenture in the bill it could not become a law, or it might be vetoed. If I do the Senator an injustice in that repetition, I shall be very glad to have him correct me.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I stated specifically that, in my opinion, the application of the debenture plan would make the tariff partially effective and probably would increase the price level—that I stand upon—but in doing the job it would work disastrously and wreck the agricultural structure in the long run. I shall be very glad to have my speech, or any part of it, inserted in the RECORD at this point in justification of my present remarks.

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, I would not question at all what the Senator says as to his position; but this is the first time upon this floor that I have heard that position stated by the Senator from Oregon or any other member of the Agricultural Committee.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. JOHNSON. I do.

Mr. NORBECK. I merely wish to call attention to the fact that the hearings disclosed no such remarks on the part of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry as he has made here now; and we had 23 hearings before the Agricultural Committee. I do not mean to argue from that that he favored the debenture plan as a measure of farm relief, because he has always favored the equalization fee; but certainly, as a member of the committee who attended every session, I was led to believe that the debenture plan with him was all right unless the President objected to it.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. JOHNSON. I do.

Mr. McNARY. The controversy concerning the debenture plan arose in the committee in executive session. I think I made myself very clear in my view. I stated that in order to get the bill before the body I would support it, reserving the right, which is contained in the first report, to vote as I pleased when it came to the floor of the Senate. I also said that if the President of the United States should make it clear that he would veto the bill I should be influenced by that attitude, and I was to that extent.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield further to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORBECK. May I add to that that the executive session followed the other hearings?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, we are doing now what ought to have been done in the beginning of this discussion: We are having some real discussion upon the debenture proposition and the attitude of the Agricultural Committee concerning it. Until this instant, sir—although I say I do not question in the slightest degree whatever may be said by the Senator from Oregon—until this instant, sir, the fact or the statement that this committee was unanimous in favor of reporting this bill with the debenture clause, and in favor of the bill with the debenture clause, has never been questioned, so far as I am aware. To-day—to-day, two hours and a half before voting upon the conference report—is the first time upon this floor, and the first time, so far as I am aware, that there has ever been a suggestion that the committee, or any part of the committee, opposed the debenture provision of the bill; but all, I had assumed from what has gone on on this floor, and from what has transpired during the debate, and from what has happened in the committee—all, I assumed, favored the debenture plan, and six were opposed to it ultimately solely upon the perfectly legitimate ground that they would be unable to obtain a farm relief bill, or the bill would be vetoed, if it were passed with the debenture plan in it. The members of the Agricultural Committee know better than I just exactly whether I am accurate in that statement, or what transpired within the committee, I concede.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have before me the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD containing the seatement of the Senator from Oregon. I do not know whether the Senator from California desires to be interrupted at this point or not.

Mr. JOHNSON. I shall be very glad to yield for that purpose. I want to get all the facts.

Mr. McNARY. I shall be glad to have the Senator read what I said.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On April 23——

Mr. McKELLAR. What page?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On April 23, at page 370 of the RECORD, while the Senator from Oregon was making his opening statement concerning the bill, this colloquy took place; and I think it will clarify the situation if I read it:

> Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?
>
> The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Nebraska?
> Mr. McNARY. I am very glad to yield.
> Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is giving a very accurate statement as to what took place in the committee; but in order to be of assistance in seeing that it is entirely accurate I should like to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that prior to last Monday, when the President sent his objections, but after the time the subcommittee had waited on the President, and when they followed his suggestions and brought up some experts of the department, the committee unanimously agreed that the debenture plan should be included in the bill.
>
> Mr. McNARY. That is true, Mr. President.
>
> Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator, in completing an accurate statement, ought to state that.
>
> Mr. McNARY. I thank the Senator from Nebraska. I must add to that, however, that there were four of those present, including the chairman, the Senator from Maine [Mr. GOULD], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. THOMAS], who reserved the right to present their views in opposition.
>
> Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes; but, in fact, the action of the committee at that time, with 14 members present, was unanimous.
>
> Mr. McNARY. Yes; that is correct.
>
> When interrupted, Mr. President, I think I was stating that my objection to the debenture plan was first based upon the proposition—a sentiment which is a principle with me—that good legislation can not be effected through a subsidy. I opposed as best I could the ship subsidy bill when it was on the floor of the Senate. I do not think a subsidy applied to the farmers would be permanent legislation.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. JOHNSON. I do.

Mr. McNARY. I thank the Senator. That is precisely what I stated. I did omit the Senator from Maine. The reservation there stated that the four of us reserved the right to act in accordance with our own judgment on the floor; but we did vote to bring out the measure with that reservation.

Mr. JOHNSON. Was not the committee in favor of the debenture plan up to the time that the President wrote this letter?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, this was all prior to the time the letter was written by the President.

Mr. JOHNSON. All right, sir; I am willing to accept the Senator's statement.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. NORBECK. But it did not all happen prior to the time the subcommittee called on the President.

Mr. McNARY. Oh, no; it did not. It was a continuing suggestion. There is really nothing in controversy. The chairman of the committee made it plain—and I am not using it for any influence here—that never in his life had he been in favor of the debenture plan, for the reasons I stated some time ago and a moment ago, and stated to different Members; but I felt, Mr. President, that it was an optional provision; it would do the job immediately, but eventually I was afraid it would act with disaster to the farmers of the country; and I voted with that reservation to bring it on the floor of the Senate, where it could be thoroughly discussed.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, if it will do the job, that is what I want to do. The point is, What will do the job? When the chairman of the Agricultural Committee says that the debenture will do the job, he and I are quite in agreement. Whatever may have been the proceedings in the committee, we agree upon one thing, at least, and that is that the debenture provision of the bill will do the job; and that I should like to do.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, that is hardly fair. I stated over and over again that it would meet the present situation by partially making the tariff effective, but in the end it would destroy the agricultural industry.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator makes his position perfectly plain now——

Mr. McNARY. I hope the Senator will finish the thought.

Mr. JOHNSON. But that position was not perfectly plain before, at least to me. Therefore we will proceed. The committee then, we will say, was divided—and I should like to hear from them during the afternoon—upon the question of the debenture clause. At any rate, they unanimously reported it, with the reservation on the part of some of those that they might afterwards act, in accordance with the usual way in which we do upon committees, as they saw fit when the matter came upon the floor.

So far, so good. The committee were acting unquestionably, as everybody in this body is acting, with the desire to do for agriculture what might be essential in order to relieve the disaster and the distress that now exist. How best can we do it? You say, "By the bill that has been presented here," and that you can do it by the bill presented here without the debenture, and that you can not do it with the bill presented with the debenture. Yet no man, sir, knows what the bill is that is presented here by the administration, eliminating the debenture clause. It is all empirical. It is asserted that the President, with the debenture clause, would veto this bill. Who speaks authoritatively for him in that regard? I have heard none upon this floor, although there may be others who can thus speak.

But why should there be a veto because of a debenture clause that is a mere option in a bill which admittedly is empirical in character, which no living soul can tell may ultimately result in one way or another? Its provisions are so far-reaching that none have been heard thus far upon this floor to tell what may be the limits to which the Nation will go in the appropriation of $500,000,000, or in the endeavor to rehabilitate agriculture. None can tell; and yet a particular part of the bill that is optional in character, and which may or may not be adopted by those whom the President appoints to take charge of the bill—that particular part is the subject of the controversy here, and the mandate is put upon all of us that we must not, under any circumstances, pass that optional clause, an optional clause, sir, that admittedly at some time or in some period or for some brief occasion may do the job that we are all seeking to do; but, nevertheless, optional as it is, we must not pass it, because it is asserted by some here, and by some beyond the confines of this Chamber, that the President may veto it if we do thus pass it with the debenture clause.

I again ask, who authoritatively says that the President of the United States will veto a mere option that gives him a right to relieve agriculture if that option shall be appended to a bill that is presented by him to the Congress of the United States?

There are other circumstances, sir, with which we necessarily must deal in a bill of this sort. I have learned this morning that the Senator from Oregon is opposed to the debenture clause, and always has been opposed to it. I learned from him that the Senator from Kansas is opposed to the debenture clause, and always has been opposed to it. Before this morning I never knew the fact. I apologize to them for having suggested that they may have been all the time in favor of the debenture provisions of this bill. Nevertheless, sir, what have we as the background of the bill, and as the background of the promise that is before us in this Congress and upon this side of this Chamber in relation to farm relief?

I recall last year, when it seemed that the political result was trembling in the balance. I remember when apparently there was revolt on in the great Middle West, and none could foresee what the results of the election might be. I remember the services were invoked of two men, distinguished Members of this body, whose aid was sought to carry the contest in the great Middle West upon the one burning issue there, that of farm relief. I remember that during that campaign two men more than any other men in all that trying time bore the burden, and made the fight for the present President of the United States. I remember the success they had in the territory they covered, and I remember, too, how their speeches in relation to farm relief, and concerning the attitude of the Republican candidate upon that subject, were broadcast throughout the land by the million.

Those two men, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART], bore the burden of the campaign. They pledged not only the Republican Party, but, in substance, the Republican candidate for President, upon the matter of farm relief, to those people in the Middle West.

These two men are known here, known to every man in this body. No man questions their integrity. None questions their character. None would be heard to belittle either their fame or their good conscience.

Those two men, mindful of their activities in the trying time last year for the Republican Party, remembering their endeavors in behalf of the Republican candidate during the last year, these two men upon the floor of the Senate say, in so many words, that in the redemption of the promises of the party which then they wrested from possible defeat, to-day, in the good faith they owe to the people of the United States, to the farmers of the great Middle West, they feel constrained to vote for a debenture provision, and both upon this floor stand advocating that debenture provision.

Talk to me, as somebody said yesterday, about leaving the administration, or uniting with somebody upon the other side, in an endeavor to embarrass somebody or some particular official! These two Senators of the United States are standing to-day where they stood last year before the American people, and I am standing to-day where they stood last year, and where the Republican Party stood last year before the American people.

Somebody else has shifted ground, not the Senator from Iowa or the Senator from Idaho. Ground has been shifted in some other direction.

So, in the story of this bill, you may take it that, first—however, there may have been a reservation of opinion by four or six members of the Committee on Agriculture—the committee reported the bill with the debenture clause in it.

You may take it that in the days gone by, when the Jardine bill was presented to the Committee on Agriculture—and it is the bill that is presented to us to-day, minus the debenture provision—that bill was repudiated by the Committees on Agriculture of both Houses of the Congress, by the Republican Party, and by the entire Congress.

You may take it to-day that the two men who made the great fight for farm relief in the farming districts of the United States in the campaign last year stand here for the debenture because of the necessity which they feel in their consciences of redeeming the pledge made by the Republican Party to the people of the United States in relation to farm relief.

You may take it, too, that there are some of the rest of us who stand here exercising our independent judgment upon a matter of economic difficulty which appears before the Senate and before the Congress.

No man need make any mistake concerning my attitude. In 20 years of public life in the State of California I have ever made plain to the people there that I act as I think I ought to act on every conceivable occasion. No man upon this side of the Chamber need labor under any delusion as to my future actions here or my past. Upon any question that comes here there is no lash of any kind that can deter me from acting exactly as I desire.

I know that there are individuals who respond to one thing and individuals who respond to another. I accuse none and criticize none; but I have found that criticism is rampant in the last few weeks, in the servile press of this Nation, concerning men who dare to vote for the debenture clause, and therefore I turn aside for a moment or two in discussion of the attitude of those who have taken that position.

I realize, sir, that there are those with whom—

The jingling of the guinea helps the hurt that honor feels.

I know that there are some who—

Crook the pregnant hinges of the knee
That thrift may follow fawning.

I realize that there are some who, whenever the party lash is applied, crawl to the one who lashes them.

"I had rather be a toad and live upon the vapor of a dungeon" than sit in this body, or any other body, and take orders upon a question of conscience from any man on earth, no matter how exalted his position.

I would "rather be a dog and bay the moon" than sit here a United States Senator, acting not as a Senator and not as an independent man with a head upon his shoulders that God gave him so he could think for himself, but acting merely as he might be driven to act by the order or the mandate or the ipse dixit of any man on the face of the earth.

Behind me in my office in California for six long years there was a motto, a quotation from the greatest of Americans. In my office in this Capitol that quotation faces me whenever I lift my eyes, and from the sainted Lincoln's words I take my philosophy of activity:

I am not bound to win, but I am bound to be true. I am not bound to succeed, but I am bound to live up to what light I have.

I must stand with anybody that stands right; stand with him while he is right and part with him when he goes wrong.

I stand by the President when I believe him to be right, but when I believe him to be wrong I part with him, and I go my own way, and I go my own way with full knowledge of what the consequences may be.

I am led, sir, in some degree to make these remarks because from the State in which I was born and from which I come many telegrams have been sent me in the last few days upon this subject. I shall read, so that Senators may understand in some little degree the mode that is adopted in order to drive men into particular positions in this body upon various bills. I have selected but two of the many like telegrams that have come to me in these last few days. The first reads:

To assist northern California woolgrowers and cattlemen on tariff situations coming up later, please support conferees' report eliminating debenture feature farm relief bill.

How naïve is that in these gentlemen. Here is another:

We greatly hope you will find it possible to vote approving conference report on relief bill. California agricultural sentiment with which we are familiar strongly favors this bill as reported from conference. We fear opposition through this bill by any California Member would prejudice our interests in new tariff bill.

You may understand something of what that means when I say to you that probably there is no State in the Union more interested in the tariff bill than the State from which I come, and very gently and subtly it is conveyed to me that if I dare to vote my conscience upon the debenture measure I will suffer in the tariff bill which ultimately is to be enacted by the Congress.

Of course, no one here would indulge in that sort of thing, and none here would be so crude as even to suggest it; but it is the mode that is ever adopted by ruthless power to drive and threaten and bend others to their will.

Many such wires have come. None, of course, will be heeded. We will go on in this body pursuing our course as we have pursued it in the past, pursuing it in order that we may do our full duty upon every matter that shall arise before this body.

What is the debenture? Merely a desire, a design, a device, by which agriculture may be put on an equality and parity with industry in relation to the tariff. Unknown and untried? Not at all, sir; both known and tried, here in this Nation and abroad. To-day the debenture in one fashion is being practiced under the tariff law. To-day we remit 20 per cent upon sugar duties to those who own sugar plantations in Cuba and import sugar from Cuba to the United States. We remit that duty to planters in Cuba. Yet the remitting of the duty to them, which constitutes a bounty to the man who is producing sugar in Cuba, is considered a magnificent part of our political economy, while remitting a duty to agriculture is considered a subsidy, a wicked bounty, and a raid upon the Treasury.

We upon this side of the aisle all believe in the tariff. All of us, of course, upon this side of the Chamber insist upon it that industry shall be protected and protected to the full. But once we protect industry to the full then we begin to deduct from the United States Treasury the very money that otherwise would go into it. In the testimony that was given before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry two incidents concrete in character that illustrate the point were made, and I make them now in order that they may be a part of this general record.

When a tariff becomes so high as to become really protective, at once we divert money from the Treasury. In the matter of aluminum ware in 1920 the duty was 25 per cent ad valorem and we imported $422,000; in 1921, $672,000, and in 1922, $780,000. In 1925 the ad valorem duty was raised to 77 per cent, and we imported but $126,000. In 1926 the ad valorem was 78 per cent, and we imported but $96,000. In 1927 the ad valorem was 77 per cent, and we imported but $72,000. The raising of the duty from 25 per cent to 70 per cent ad valorem kept out of the Treasury in round numbers $400,000. Where did it go? Why, it went, of course, to the Aluminum Trust. That is good economics and in that we must believe, and because it goes to industry it is all right. But let there be a drawback provision by which a part of the tariff will go to the farmer, and that is a bounty and a subsidy and it is a raid upon the Treasury of the United States. What is the difference between the two?

Again, take the concrete instance of pocketknives. In 1920 we imported $585,000 worth with an ad valorem tariff of 51 per cent. In 1921 we imported $790,000 worth with an ad valorem tariff of 56 per cent. In 1922, with an ad valorem tariff of 63 per cent, we imported $936,000 worth. In 1925 we imported $298,000 only, and the ad valorem tariff was then fixed at 116 per cent. In 1926, with an ad valorem tariff of 117 per cent, we imported only $267,000 worth. So that in the first three years of the old tariff we imported $2,319,000 and collected a duty of $1,200,000, and when the tariff was raised as I have indicated we diverted from the Treasury in round numbers $355,000. That is all right. I do not question it, and I do not disapprove it at all. But I say that when the time comes when we are seeking to put, as we pledged ourselves we would put, agriculture upon an equality and a parity with industry, then we ought to take part of the tariff, because the tariff does not now aid agriculture, and give it to agriculture that it may be put at least in small measure with its exportable surplus upon an equality and a parity with industry.

So much for the means itself of the debenture. Why should it not go into this bill? Why should not it be acted upon by this body? The only reason that is urged is the one to which I have adverted, that the bill would be vetoed with it in. I can not conceive the possibility that a bill designed to relieve agriculture that is wholly experimental in character will be vetoed because there is an optional clause in that bill which would enable the President of the United States to do some other thing than that which originally was contemplated.

I listened to the testimony before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry as given by the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Hyde. I thought that he bore himself extremely well under very, very difficult circumstances. But I gathered from his testimony, though I have not read it over since the time I listened to it, that what he asked was a board of general powers, which he never defined and which he left in general language, with an appropriation of $300,000,000 to enable that board with its general powers to go on and see whether or not some relief could not be found for agriculture. That was practically the testimony of the Secretary of Agriculture. In some way subsequently, doubtless upon testimony that was given, the $300,000,000 was raised to $500,000,000 and appears in the bill with its general board to go forward and find some relief.

It is said to us that we must not under any circumstances put an optional clause in the bill by which some other mode may be carried into effect. Neither logical is it, nor should it commend itself to any Member of the Senate. The question after all is that indicated yesterday, Do we desire and will we put agriculture upon an equality with industry? Do we desire and will we give to agriculture what by the tariff to-day we give unto industry? That, after all, in the last analysis is the great question that must be answered.

In 1912 I took part, sir, in a glorious political adventure, more glorious than any political adventure than had occurred since the birth of the Republican Party. I remember, sir, in the convention that was held in August in Chicago by those who then called themselves progressives of the United States an opening speech, a keynote address made by a very distinguished man who once was a Senator in this body from the State of Indiana, a man of eloquence, ability, and character, who has gone to his reward beyond. I never will forget that keynote. He told in his peculiarly eloquent way the story of conditions then existing, and he ended with a refrain, a refrain that all that convention took up. His one shibboleth was, "Pass prosperity around."

A great Nation is ours to-day, the greatest in all the world. There is just one part of it, sir, where disaster is met with; just one part of this land where there is not the prosperity that exists in other parts. That one part is found in the agricultural districts of America. They cry aloud to-day to the Congress; they cry aloud to-day to the people of the United States; they ask that they be given only justice in the same measure that we accord it by the tariff to industry throughout the land. They beg of us, sir, to pass prosperity around. I am ready, sir, to pass prosperity around to the farmers of the land as well as to those who live in the city of New York or those who engage in the industries that we foster so well. To-day is the last opportunity of this Congress to pass prosperity around. Shall the cry of the farmer be denied because a promise is made forsooth or the idea prevails that we must not do what some man says we must not do? Pass prosperity around, sir, and let us give, by the only clause that gives it in this bill, prosperity to the farmers of the land and puts them on a parity with industry.

OIL LAND LEASES

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, owing to the fact that an agreement has been entered into under which we shall vote upon the conference report on the farm relief bill at 4 o'clock this afternoon, I shall not detain the Senate more than a few minutes in discussion of the matter which I have in mind.

Under date of March 12, 1929, just eight days after the present administration was inducted into office, word came from the White House in this language:

> There will be no leasing or disposal of Government oil lands, no matter in what category they may lie, or Government holdings or Government control, except those made mandatory by Congress. In other words, there will be complete conservation of Government oil in this administration.

Mr. President, I desire to say at the outset that I have no complaint to lay against a general policy of conservation as applied to the natural resources of the Commonwealth. On the contrary, I am in general accord with such a policy. But I believe that the policy thus declared by the leader and titular head of the present administration is unfair and discriminatory in its operation and effect.

The general leasing act approved February 25, 1920, followed prolonged hearings. The controlling purpose in mind in the passage of the act was to bring about and produce the development of those natural resources. The whole scope and object of the act was to that end and was designed to accomplish that result. It is true, Mr. President, that the act vests in the Department of the Interior the power to promulgate rules and regulations to carry the law into effect, but general phraseology of that kind frequently found in acts of Congress means that such regulations must be administered in harmony with the act and to carry it forward rather than to overthrow, destroy, or render the act of Congress inert. If the new policy declared by the present administration brings about a cessation of production and thereby renders the act of Congress inert and impotent, it violates the scope and the purpose as well as the operative effect of the act, and is therefore utterly void. I question seriously whether the announcement as applied by the administration is valid. I seriously doubt the power of an administrative department of the Government going so far under the guise of promulgating and administering rules and regulations as to render inert and impotent a solemn act of Congress.

But aside from the strict, legal aspect of the situation, and addressing myself to it as a matter of policy, I understand that less than 3 per cent of the crude-oil production in the country is produced on Government-owned land. Those lands lie in three or four of the young and relatively impoverished western States. They are making progress. They are making advancement. They are attracting and enticing outsiders to come with their wealth and aid in the development of those Commonwealths. I undertake to say that a policy that restricts and impedes that development as to only 3 per cent of the production of that commodity in the country is unsound, unjust, and discriminatory in its operation and effect.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator suffer an interruption?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BRATTON. I yield.

Mr. KING. May I say to my friend from New Mexico that it is not quite 3 per cent, but whatever is produced is not sufficient now for the consumptive needs of the States in which it is produced, so that oil will have to be imported into Wyoming, Utah, New Mexico, and other public-land States in order to meet the immediate demands of the people. The President's new and illegal policy not only prohibits exploration upon the public lands, and production therefrom, but the inhabitants in this large section of the United States will be compelled to pay heavy freight rates to bring into their territory sufficient oil, gasoline, and oil products to meet their demands. In that way this policy of the President is playing into the hands of the Oil Trust, into the hands of the Standard Oil Co., and other large producing companies whose income last year was more than $500,000,000, $222,000,000 of which went into the pockets of the Standard Oil Co. and its subsidiary organizations.

Mr. BRATTON. I thank the junior Senator from Utah for that contribution to the discussion. When I said that 3 per cent of the entire production of oil of the country is produced upon public lands, I was, of course, speaking in round numbers. I think, to be exact, that it is slightly less than 3 per cent; but, Mr. President, a policy that restricts, impedes, and imperils development as to 3 per cent of the production throughout the country can have no appreciable effect in conserving oil production generally. I assert that conservation should be applied to those portions of the country where oil is produced upon privately-owned lands at least contemporaneously with a policy of restriction upon public lands.

Furthermore, Mr. President, since the act of 1920 became a law a general policy respecting its administration has been evolved and carried forward by the Department of the Interior. Among other things so-called group development was recognized. Application for permits and permits themselves under the so-called group development were recognized and protected by the department. That policy has been followed generally as to production upon public lands. I am told now that under the new policy, following the presidential pronouncement of March 12, permits involved in so-called group development are imperiled and may be canceled, annulled, and not further recognized.

Mr. President, if the department, either by affirmative action or otherwise, has led the holders of such permits into the belief that their rights would be protected, that their permits would be continued, and, relying upon that policy, they have invested their money, expended their wealth, and have placed themselves in that position, in faith of the policy theretofore followed by the department, it would be unfair and indefensible to change the policy to the detriment, harm, and ruin of those applicants and those permittees. In good conscience, in fair dealing, in recognition of the ordinary rules of business affairs, those persons should not be jeopardized as to their property rights, as to their investments made upon the strength and in faith of the policy previously followed by the Government since 1920 up to 1929. It is in behalf of those people, who have equitable rights even though they have not met the strict letter of the law, that I protest.

Mr. CUTTING and Mr. KING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BRATTON. I yield first to my colleague.

Mr. CUTTING. When the President called the conference of the nine chief oil-producing States was it not the impression of my colleague that this matter, among others, would be thoroughly discussed and debated?

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, that was my understanding.

Mr. CUTTING. Is it not the principal matter concerned with oil production which interests the Rocky Mountain States at the present time?

Mr. BRATTON. Undoubtedly so, Mr. President.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the senior Senator from New Mexico yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the senior Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BRATTON. I yield.

Mr. KING. With reference to the statement just made by the Senator from New Mexico concerning equitable rights, the courts have repeatedly held that rights initiated under rules, regulations, and practices of a department were vested, and those enjoying or possessing such rights could not be deprived of them, either by Executive authority or legislative enactment. Under the act of 1920, regulations and rules were promulgated by the Interior Department; these became the basis or the foundation upon which rights were established by persons following the same. In my opinion, where departmental regulations are promulgated, pursuant to authority, rights may be obtained thereunder which are just as valid as if they rested upon some specific statute. Such rights are not only equitable but legal, and, as stated, the possessors of such rights may not be deprived of the same. The order of President Hoover and the orders of the Secretary of the Interior not only attempted to nullify the leasing act of 1920 but the regulations and rules of the department promulgated under the authority of the act. And the orders referred to are not only prospective, but they are retrospective. The American people do not look with favor upon ex post facto laws, nor will they, in my opinion, when they become acquainted with the act of the President and the orders of the Secretary of the Interior based thereon, approve of the same; they will particularly condemn the attempt to apply them retroactively and to destroy property rights and vested interests of thousands of American citizens.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I do not go so far as does the Senator from Utah in making the positive assertion that such rules are void. I do question their legality, and express grave doubt concerning their validity, but, conceding them to be valid, I assert that those persons who have invested money upon the strength of the policy, rules, and regulations promulgated and carried forward by the Department of the Interior since the general leasing act of 1920 became effective should not be jeopardized and deprived of their holdings and their investments as the result of a new policy declared without warning to those persons.

I join my colleague in expressing the belief that this is one feature, if not the major feature, of the problem to be discussed, and doubtless now being discussed, at the conference now in progress at Pueblo. I hope, Mr. President, that the conferees there, including those representing the Government and those representing the several States participating in the conference, will recognize the gross and grave injustice which would be visited upon these holders if their investments should be taken away or jeopardized as the result of a new policy prepared without previous notice and virtually given retroactive effect.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator suffer another interruption?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BRATTON. I do.

Mr. KING. We hear a great deal about the policy of the administration. I had supposed that under our form of government, this being a government of law, the executive department was to execute the law and its policy was to carry out the legislative will. This constant talk about the President's policy or the policy of a department is repugnant to democratic institutions and to our form of government. What right has the President to have a policy with respect to the oil lands of the United States? Under the Constitution of the United States Congress alone has the power to dispose of and make all needful regulations respecting the public domain; and when it is said that the President has a policy; that the President can nullify a law; that the President can pursue this policy or that policy, I wonder where the authority is; I wonder if we are not projecting ourselves into past ages, reviving old, worn-out customs and policies and principles and seeking to give to the President of the United States dictatorial authority instead of considering him merely as the executor of the law.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to his colleague?

Mr. BRATTON. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. CUTTING. I do not wish to interrupt my colleague's speech, but I hope before he concludes he will also discuss the type of coercion which is threatened against certain States if they do not give in and comply with the program laid before them.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I will address myself to that phase of the subject now. It is directly relevant. The interview appearing in to-day's press, which has already been inserted in the RECORD at the request of my colleague, coming from Mr. Requa at the Colorado Springs conference, is easily susceptible of being interpreted as a direct threat of coercion against several States if they shall fail to conform to the new policy. Mr. President, if that is the purpose of it, and that is what he had in mind, I desire to say in behalf of one State participating in the conference, the State which I have the honor of representing in part in this body, that it will not serve its purpose. Regardless of what else may be taking place in this country, the time certainly and surely has not come when a sovereign State can be coerced into surrendering a part of its heritage or any part of its industrial development. I protest against any form or any phase of such coercion against one of the sovereign States of the Union. I join my colleague in saying that the interview easily bears that interpretation. I so construe it; I emphatically repudiate it.

It is my belief, Mr. President, that the public lands should be ceded to the several States in which they are situated. I have heretofore expressed that view on the floor of the Senate; I shall not engage in a discussion of it at this time; I think it is unfair as among the several States of the Union to permit some of them to exercise sovereignty and dominion over all the lands within their exterior boundaries and deny that right to other States. I have introduced a bill to cede the public lands to the several States and shall address the Senate later in behalf of that measure.

However, that question aside, I earnestly assert on behalf of the State which my colleague and I represent in this body that any type or form of coercion will be ineffective so far as the people of our State are concerned.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD at this point an article by Dr. George Otis Smith, Director of the Geological Survey, which appeared in the May issue of The Nation's Business, wherein the policy is reviewed, the history of the act as administered up to that time is carefully explained, and the effect which the conservation policy will have upon production in the several States is discussed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

[From The Nation's Business, May, 1929]

WHAT THE NEW OIL POLICY MEANS

By George Otis Smith, Director United States Geological Survey and former president American Institute of Mining and Metallurgical Engineers

"There will be no leases or disposal of Government oil lands, no matter in what category they may lie, of Government holdings or Government controls, except those made mandatory by Congress. In other words, there will be complete conservation of Government oil in this administration."

This statement issued at the White House March 12, less than 10 days after his inauguration, defines what may reasonably be expected to become the Hoover policy on oil.

Let us examine this policy to determine just what it means, physically applied, how it will affect production of oil from Government lands, and what, if any, will be its influence on private oil exploitation.

Permits to prospect for oil on Government land and leases of this land for development have hitherto been issued under the mineral leasing law passed by Congress February 25, 1920. Between that date and June 30, 1928, the end of the fiscal year, 197,000,000 barrels of oil were produced from public lands under Government lease and permit. For the fiscal year 1928 some 23,000,000 barrels were produced.

OVERPRODUCTION WILL CEASE

The President's decree will have small immediate effect on this production. However, the best time to stop production is before the wells are drilled, and to this root of the tree of overproduction the President has laid his ax.

Immediately after his statement was issued, Secretary of the Interior Wilbur instructed all local land offices, through the Commissioner of the General Land Office, to receive no further applications for permits to prospect for oil and gas on the public domain and to reject all applications now pending.

This means that the 4,500 permits to drill in Federal fields usually issued annually will be withheld. It means, further, a considerable thinning out of the 20,000 oil and gas permits now outstanding. Secretary Wilbur has appointed a committee of three to pass on these permits and recommend which should be canceled.

On this committee are Edward C. Finney, Solicitor of the Department of the Interior; William Spry, Commissioner of the General Land Office; and myself. To handle the question of permit reviews expeditiously, the department has drawn up an outline of general procedure, the high lights of which are:

"Representative cases may be recommended for public hearing before the Secretary of the Interior to determine lines of policy. Those in good standing will not be proceeded against as long as their terms are met. Those not involving expenditure of money in development work will be denied by the General Land Office.

"The General Land Office will hold for cancellation, allowing 15 days in which to show cause, all permits on which there is no prima facie evidence that money has been spent in development work. The Geological Survey will report to the Secretary the likelihood of oil and gas drainage of Government lands in various producing and wildcatting fields where claim of drainage is made."

This examination will stop future operations on permits that have earned no right to continue and, as a corollary, will make a later lease obligatory if oil is discovered.

It does not mean stoppage of leases on Osage Indian lands. By act of March 2, this year, these leases continue at the rate of 25,000 acres annually. Previously the figure was 100,000 acres annually.

By retarding development on public lands, the President has pointed the way to make control of excess oil production only a matter of time. Existing wells will decline in productivity and, without additional drilling and discovery of new fields, the balancing of supply and demand will be comparatively easy.

Already the California oil companies are cooperating with the Government to hold back development of the newly discovered and very rich Kettleman Hills field. This move is probably the most promising item in the new program.

OIL INDUSTRY SEES SAVINGS

We are now producing each year millions of barrels more oil than we consume. At present speed, judging from geological data, it will be all too soon that the Nation's oil supply will be exhausted. The present storage of half a billion barrels of crude oil in steel tanks involves an expense that a poorer industry could not carry and the oil industry itself now realizes that it needs to reduce its inventories.

The private industry's reaction to the President's order is already to be seen in recommendations of the American Petroleum Institute's committee on world production and consumption of petroleum and its products. This committee, headed by R. C. Holmes, president of the Texas Oil Co., recommended a return, April 1, to the 1928 production basis, and the institute's directors adopted that report March 27 in New York.

The total production for 1928 was 902,000,000 barrels, a daily average of 2,450,000 barrels. The daily average in March, 1929, was about 2,645,000 barrels. The proposed action, then, will cut the daily average production nearly 200,000 barrels, but it is claimed without causing any shortage whatever in gasoline.

President Hoover's action with respect to Government oil may, by calling attention to the need of conservation, lead to a more rigid program for all resources.

NATURAL RESOURCES SHRINK

Of his once vast domain, Uncle Sam had left in 1928, aside from the national forests, parks, and like reserves, only 193,847,240 acres of public land in the States and something more than 3,500,000 acres in Alaska. The greater portion of this land in the States lies in the West.

The natural resources of these lands are estimated by the Interior Department to include 30,000,600 acres of coal lands containing more than 200,000,000,000 tons of coal; half a million acres of phosphate land that can supply 8,000,000,000 tons of this essential fertilizer as its needs on American farms is better realized; undetermined acreage of potash deposits; 65 developed oil and gas fields with an annual production of 33,000,000 barrels of oil; and 4,000,000 acres of oil shale from which possibly 60,000,000,000 barrels of oil can be extracted when prices warrant the higher cost.

Further than this, the Government has retained the mineral rights to about 19,000,000 acres of land patented under the stock raising law. Specific mineral rights have been retained in 11,750,000 acres.

Broadly, the Government's policy in recent years, traced by legislative acts, is to retain the ownership of public oil lands and to permit their development as to resources through permit and lease. To carry out this policy efficiently the Geological Survey for 20 years and more has been making an intensive survey of Government lands and resources. A great portion of the public lands containing valuable timber have been withdrawn and incorporated in our national forests under the administration of the Forest Service. Other natural resources have been classified under separate heads and given the attention they deserve in the public interest.

The rest of the country needs to count as national assets these resources of the great Western States. The sane and safe development of our natural resources constitutes building for the future.

That a halt in oil production means the study of other items in the public estate and the more intense application of conservation of our other natural resources is a foregone conclusion.

Mr. BRATTON. Likewise, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an article which appeared in the New York Tribune of May 2, 1929, dealing with the subject of the production of crude oil throughout the country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

[From the New York Tribune, May 2, 1929]

OIL PRODUCTION IN MARCH SETS RECORD FOR UNITED STATES—82,515,000 BARRELS OUTPUT WITH GASOLINE AHEAD OF SIMILAR PERIOD OF 1928—TEXAS PETROLEUM LEADS—CONSUMPTION OF "GAS" GAINS ALSO, MINES BUREAU SAYS

WASHINGTON, May 1.—Production of crude petroleum in the United States in March broke all records for any month, totaling 82,515,000 barrels, a daily average of 2,662,000 barrels, according to reports the Bureau of Mines made public to-day. While the total for the month was greater than for any other similar period, the daily average was below that of February, when 2,703,000 barrels per day were produced, the difference being accounted for in the increased number of days during March.

The daily average gasoline production in March showed a slight decline, as compared with February, but was 18 per cent above that of March, 1928. Gasoline consumption showed a material increase, rising from a daily average of 813,000 barrels in February to 919,000 barrels in March, a gain of 13 per cent.

Stocks of gasoline again showed an increase, but this was considerably below the average increase for the last several months. On March 31, 1929, stocks of gasoline amounted to 47,205,000 barrels, which at the current rate of total demand represents 44 days' supply, as compared with 48 days' supply on hand a month ago and 45 days' supply a year ago.

Of the three leading producing States, California, Texas, and Oklahoma, Texas alone recorded an increase in daily average of crude petroleum in March. This resulted in the main from increased output of the Salt Flat field. Daily average production in California showed a decrease, which was largely due to the decline at Santa Fe Springs. Oklahoma showed a material decline in daily average production, this being due to a more or less general curtailment throughout the State.

Stocks of crude petroleum east of California continued to increase, but at a much reduced rate as compared with February. The increase in stocks east of California was approximately 2,700,000 barrels, of which more than half was in refinery stocks. Stocks of light and heavy crudes in California increased nearly 3,500,000 barrels, the major portion of which occurred in the light grades.

The reduction in daily average crude production with a consequent lessening in the amounts of crude oil going to storage was reflected in the change in stocks of all oils, which in March increased at a slower rate than in February. Another factor which operated to reduce the amount of oil going to storage was the increase in gasoline consumption, although this was practically nullified by the opposing factor of decreased fuel-oil consumption.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, in conclusion let me say that I think the new policy of conservation is sound if it is administered with due regard to the economic conditions existing throughout the country, including the public-land States; but I protest against a policy that restricts, impedes, and thwarts development in a few of the western public-land States wherein less than 3 per cent of the entire crude oil of the country is produced. It will have no measurable effect upon the production throughout the country; it will bring about no appreciable improvement in the condition throughout the country; in other words, Mr. President, it will help nobody very much, but it will harm greatly three or four States, New Mexico being among them. It is against that sort of thing that I direct the attention of the Senate.

FARM RELIEF—CONFERENCE REPORT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1) to establish a Federal farm board to promote the effective merchandising of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce, and to place agriculture on a basis of economic equality with other industries.

Mr. COPELAND obtained the floor.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. SCHALL. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] is still ill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, with the exception of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], I suppose I have had more criticism passed upon me for being for the debenture plan than anybody else in the Senate. Practically every newspaper in New York City has ridiculed my position. I have no fault to find with this criticism. It is the right of every man in public life, whether in a legislative body, in official position, or as a molder of public sentiment, to express an opinion if he has one. I am satisfied, however, that many criticisms that have been passed have been uttered by persons who know very little about the subject.

I had a telegram this morning reading:

> Respectfully hope you will stop playing politics and vote to-day according to your conscience.

Possibly I can not convince this man that I am not playing politics; but I assure the Senate that I am going to vote according to my conscience.

There have been many disagreeable things in the press about Members of the Senate who have seen fit to favor the debenture. We have been accused of playing politics—"peanut politics"—at the expense of the American farmer.

Mr. President, I want to say this: While I have no fault to find with those persons who pass criticism, I want it understood by the country that I know of nobody on this side of the aisle who has taken a position with reference to this bill with the purpose of embarrassing the President. I know of no such person. Of course, there is only one man that any given individual can know—only one man whose thoughts he can measure. Every man knows himself and knows nobody else. So far as I am concerned, however, I have no desire to embarrass the President; I am not playing politics; and any intimation to the contrary, as was said yesterday, is a cowardly insinuation. Any such intimation is one that might come, false as it is, from the blackest depths of hell.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to my friend.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I dislike to interrupt the Senator. I know his time is limited.

On several occasions it was stated to me that the leader of the Democratic side of this Chamber was proceeding to bring about a condition in this body which would result in embarrassing the administration by having both farm relief proposals defeated. My reply was that a farm relief bill would pass the Congress in a few hours if one thing was done by the administration, namely, to have a record vote on the debenture plan taken in the House of Representatives. I said that I had heard the leader of this side of the Chamber again and again make the statement that he only wanted a record vote on the debenture plan in the House. There is no effort here to embarrass in any way the passage of some kind of a farm relief bill.

I just want to add this thought, as one who is opposed to both the debenture plan and the House bill: Instead of this movement being antagonistic to the President or partisan, my observation has led me to believe that rarely has there been a measure in this body that had behind it more of the spirit of crusaders than that motivating those supporting the debenture plan. Now, I disagree with those who advocate it; I think their principle is dangerous, and I am opposed to it; but I must frankly and fairly state, and I repeat what I said, that I have seen more of the spirit of the crusader on the part of the men advocating this measure than I have seen in the case of almost any other measure in this body during recent years. The country should realize this and not think the opposition is actuated by unworthy motives.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator for what he has said. A moment ago I expressed my own attitude of mind. I want to say further, that my contacts with my colleagues on this side of the aisle and with Republicans who have decided to vote for the debenture, indicate to me that every man is driven by a desire to serve the country.

Talk about embarrassing the President! I want to say that our effort is not to embarrass the President, but to keep from embarrassing the farmers. Unless we can pass a farm relief bill that will have in it the hope of some replenishment and continued replenishment of the fund, the money proposed to be made available will be frittered away, utterly lost, and no permanent relief brought to agriculture.

That is the reason why those of us who have taken this stand are taking it. For myself, as I said the very first day the bill was up, I would prefer the equalization fee. I think the bill brought in by the distinguished Senator from Oregon with the equalization fee in it, a bill for which I voted twice, and voted to pass over the President's veto, was an ideal bill, but there are great lawyers in this body who say that the fee provision is unconstitutional and that that way is not a suitable way to replenish the fund.

Because it is impossible to have the equalization fee, which, as I have said, I regard as a better plan, I stated, and I repeat, that I vote for the debenture "holding my nose," meaning that I do not like that particular way of replenishing the fund. But since there is no better way, I am glad to vote, and shall vote this afternoon as I did on the other occasion.

Both the political parties promised agricultural relief. Yesterday the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] pointed out the position taken by the Republican Party. It is practically identical, as far as I can see, with the position taken at the Democratic convention by my party. I find in the Democratic platform this language:

> Farm relief must rest on the basis of an economic equality of agriculture with other industries. To give this equality a remedy must be found which will include, among other things:
> (a) Credit aid by loans to cooperatives on at least as favorable a basis as the Government aid to the merchant marine.

The following is the thing I had particularly in mind:

> (b) Creation of a Federal farm board to assist the farmer and stock raiser in the marketing of their products as the Federal Reserve Board has done for the banker and business man. When our archaic banking and currency system was revised after its record of disaster and panic under Republican administrations, it was a Democratic Congress in the administration of a Democratic President that accomplished its stabilization through the Federal reserve act creating the Federal Reserve Board with powers adequate to its purpose.

Then the platform goes on:

> Now, in the hour of agriculture's need, the Democratic Party pledges the establishment of a new agricultural policy fitted to present conditions.

I want to call attention to that language. The delegates were satisfied that no satisfactory proposal, no plan, had been devised to give adequate agricultural relief. Because of that feeling on the part of the delegates the convention said:

> Now, in the hour of agriculture's need, the Democratic Party pledges the establishment of a new agricultural policy fitted to present conditions, under the direction of a farm board vested with all the powers necessary to accomplish for agriculture what the Federal Reserve Board has been able to accomplish for finance, in full recognition of the fact that the banks of the country, through voluntary cooperation, were never able to stabilize the financial system of the country until Government powers were invoked to help them.

I submit, Mr. President, that unless the proposed farm board shall have powers similar to those conferred upon the Federal Reserve Board, it can not succeed. It must have a way of replenishing the fund; otherwise the money will be wasted, as I shall mention again in a few moments. So the platform says that to give this equality a remedy must be found, and farm relief must rest on the basis of an economic equality of agriculture with other industries.

Is there such a basis? We know there is not. There is no such basis. The farmer is the victim of the protective tariff system as it is applied at the present time. Everything he buys has increased in price by reason of the tariff. The farmer is the only man left in the open field of competition. He sells in a world market, but practically everything he buys under the present law is enhanced in price because of the tariff.

Let me say this, further, when the tariff bill which is pending now in the Congress shall be passed, the farmer will be infinitely worse off than he is at present.

Congress was called in special session for the ostensible purpose of aiding the farmer. Every Senator knows that if there had not been a tariff revision in prospect there never would have been an extra session of the Congress. It was mere camouflage to state that the Congress was called in special session to help the farmer, and the proof lies in the fact that in the tariff bill which comes to us from the House——

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. In a moment. For every dollar agriculture benefits, agriculture will pay $3 more by reason of the increased prices which will be the result of that bill.

Now I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. ALLEN. I was merely attracted by the statement of the able Senator from New York that the reasons given for the special session were camouflage of the desire for a tariff bill. I want to ask the Senator from New York if he read the President's message upon the subject of the special session?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; I read the President's message.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask if he recalls the fact that the President in calling the session said that he hoped the revision of the tariff would be limited to those articles in the farm schedule which obviously needed revision?

Mr. COPELAND. I hope that the President is not so innocent as the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. ALLEN. May I understand a little more clearly, then, if the Senator is insinuating that the President gave us a message in which he was insincere?

Mr. COPELAND. I think the President really wanted to limit tariff action. I think he now wants to limit it, and if he has sufficient force back of him to control the Republican Senators he will have the kind of a tariff bill suggested by the Senator from Kansas. But the Senator from Kansas is extremely innocent, if I may say so, if he thinks the reactionary Senators on the other side are going to submit to a tariff which will be limited to a few articles. The Senator from Kansas surely knows what is really going to happen.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York regard it as ill-natured on my part if I use the same words upon him which he used on me yesterday, to the effect that that is a "cowardly insinuation"?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I heard what the Senator from Kansas said yesterday, and I heard what he said to-day. I want to say to the Senator from Kansas that the charge he made against us was that we were playing politics, and the answer given to him was that that was a cowardly insinuation. I repeat it.

But I want to ask the Senator whether he favors the tariff bill as it comes from the House?

Mr. ALLEN. Before I answer that question, which I will be very glad indeed to answer, I want to say that I made no statement yesterday to the effect that the Democratic side was playing politics. I merely read, in answer to the able Senator from Idaho, the conclusion of the press upon that subject, and I did not know the point was so tender, or I think I should have abstained from that.

Mr. COPELAND. I assume the Senator is apologizing now.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes. That is fine. Touching the subject of the tariff bill as it comes from the House, I am not in favor of the tariff bill as it comes from the House.

Mr. COPELAND. I congratulate the Senator—

> And while the lamp holds out to burn,
> The vilest sinner may return.

I think I may say to the leader on our side, and to the progressive Republicans, that we have another convert.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Another "pseudo-Republican."

Mr. COPELAND. Of course the Senator makes himself a "pseudo-Republican."

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. I think the Senator from Kansas referred to them yesterday as "nonconformists." I assume that to be the same as "pseudo-Republicans."

Mr. COPELAND. I take it that those terms are synonymous.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In view of the condemnation which the Senator from Kansas has just expressed of the tariff bill as it passed the House of Representatives, it would be interesting to know why he is opposed to the bill.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; I think it would be. I will yield to the Senator from Kansas to answer the question.

Mr. ALLEN. I am opposed to it because——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Will the Senator from New York yield further?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does the Senator consider himself a "nonconformist" or a "pseudo-Republican" because he is opposed to the bill as it passed the House of Representatives?

Mr. ALLEN. I think not yet.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator, then, is anticipating passing into that stage where he will admit himself to be either a "pseudo-Republican" or a "nonconformist." I welcome him to the list.

Mr. ALLEN. I wish to shade the Senator's meaning. I am anticipating the possibility of it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes. Will the Senator be disappointed if I announce that we are anticipating the probability of it?

Mr. ALLEN. Of course, the Senator must admit that there is a difference in the viewpoints.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The viewpoints seem to be pretty close together.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. KING. May I say, with all good feeling, to my friend from Kansas, that if he will study the record of his party in the formulation of tariff bills, he will find that, no matter how oppressive and unwise such measures were when they reached the Senate, and no matter how much they exploited the people, the trusts and monopolies and special and favored interests usually got in their work more effectively in the Senate, so that the bills, when they emerged from the Senate, were infinitely worse than when they passed the House. The Senator, I think, will have to join with these Senators who believe this Hawley bill to be unsound and unjust if he expects any improvement in the same. This measure is now before the Committee on Finance of the Senate, and an army of interested persons are invading Washington in order to secure higher rates and greater opportunities to exploit the people.

Mr. ALLEN. Permit me to say that I do not share the gloom of the Senator from Utah upon that subject. I have seen some very excellent improvements made in legislation upon the floor of the Senate. I have also heard the general statement which the Senator from Utah has made touching tariff making. I have heard it for a good many years. I have heard it in every campaign, and I have noticed that in practically every campaign the people have decided that the Senator from Utah is mistaken in his philosophy.

Mr. KING. I need only invite the attention of the Senator to the almost universal condemnation of the Fordney-McCumber bill in the reputable, high-minded, and independent Republican press of the United States. I invite the attention of the Senator to the statement of one of the ablest Republicans who has ever been in this body, one beloved by all, former Senator Knute Nelson. He stated that the Fordney-McCumber bill as it came from the Finance Committee of the Senate was in the interest of trusts and various manufacturing interests; that their representatives came here with their little black bags and went into the committee room; that they knew what they wanted, and got what they wanted. If time permitted, I could present to the Senate hundreds of statements from the leading Republican newspapers and from outstanding Republican leaders in which they condemned the tariff measures which have been enacted by the Republican Party.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. The Senator from Kansas, if I may have his attention, stated a while ago in a serious moment that he is opposed to the tariff bill as it came to us from the House. I should like to have the Senator tell us briefly why he is opposed to the bill.

Mr. ALLEN. In the beginning I think there was no occasion for a general revision of the tariff. I came here in favor of a limited revision of the tariff in the agricultural schedules, making tariff legislation incidental to the program of farm legislation.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I fear I am in danger of losing the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York has a right to yield, but not for speeches. The Chair calls attention to the fact that the time for debate on the conference report is limited.

Mr. COPELAND. I am glad to yield for a question, but not for a speech. I would like to say to the Senator from Kansas, since he has admitted that he is out of sympathy with the tariff bill as it came from the House and apparently thought it would be wise to do something for the farmer, that the Republican Party has fooled the farmer through a generation. It has pretended to be a friend of the farmer. In spite of this alleged friendship we are importing into this country two or three billion dollars' worth—I do not say millions, but billions—two or three billion dollars' worth of farm products, agricultural products, products that could be raised on the farms of America and which are being brought in because of the failure of the Republican Party to enact suitable tariff legislation. I am not saying that personally I would favor a tariff which in effect would be an embargo upon any of those products, but I simply want to present the fact, because it is a fact that we are bringing in those two or three billion dollars' worth of products which could be raised upon American farms had the Republican Party been alert to its responsibility. It has been the farmers' party, but it has not been faithful to its duty.

These imported products, I think it is safe to say, could be grown in the the United States and would create a demand for a million American farms. I have seen figures pointing out the sad condition of the farmer, the income which he might receive from products now raised abroad, figures showing that 75,000,000 acres of American lands are left unplowed because of the importation of those products.

It is easy to say "75,000,000 acres." How much land is that? All of the wheat acreage of the United States, in every State of the Union, amounts to but 50,000,000 acres, and yet we are bringing in products to grow which we could duplicate those 50,000,000 acres. Twenty-five million acres besides could be added to the number of acres under cultivation raising the products which are now imported. The Republican Party is not taking care of the farmer by affording him something more than the mere necessities of life. He has not been given proper assistance. He has been fooled every time before election, has voted the Republican ticket and then been laughed at ever afterwards, and that is what will happen now.

I want to speak about the debenture. Why do we need a way to replenish the revolving fund?

We are proposing to give the farm board $500,000,000. To the average citizen that seems so much money that he may imagine it will never be used up, but that is not the experience of Government bodies. This money will gradually disappear.

Why do I say that it will disappear? Why do I make the positive statement? Let us analyze it.

For what purpose is the money going to be used? In the first place there will be, so far as wheat is concerned, increased elevator service. I am told by informed persons that there are not elevators enough now to take care of the crops, that there is a limited capacity in those elevators. So a part of this money will be used to build more elevators to take care of more grain. In my judgment that would be helpful to the farmer, because it would permit the stabilizing corporation or other agency of the farm board to distribute to the public the grain needed to feed the people, to release it from the elevators as the requirements of the country dictated. There would be, in other words, orderly marketing.

But what about the surplus? What is going to become of the surplus? We raise in this country about 800,000,000 bushels of wheat, and we require about 600,000,000 bushels a year for domestic consumption for feeding the people. We have an average of about 200,000,000 bushels of surplus wheat. To preserve the domestic price any time there is a slump, as there has been through the past several days in the Chicago market, the corporation will go into the market and buy. It will buy in order to maintain the price, and of course ultimately it will buy the surplus. Unless the farmer is to be cheated and robbed and disappointed he will be getting under the operation of this plan a greater price than he would get without the bill. But all the time in those great elevators which have been built there will be stored up 100,000,000 to 200,000,000 bushels of surplus wheat which must be disposed of in some manner.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. ALLEN. Does the Senator from New York know how much of surplus wheat is stored in the New York elevators at this time?

Mr. COPELAND. I understand we have in the elevators of the country at this time 250,000,000 to 300,000,000 bushels.

Mr. ALLEN. Does the Senator believe that the 21 cents per bushel should go to those elevators upon the surplus wheat they are holding?

Mr. COPELAND. I am glad the Senator asks me that question. I am very much obliged to him. I forgive him for all the past.

Mr. ALLEN. I thought that was a subject which had escaped the Senator's mind.

Mr. COPELAND. I can see no reason why those men who are seeking to profit by the farmer's necessity and who bought this wheat and stored it and are holding it now in the elevators should profit by the new law. I wish the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] might have introduced an amendment to his bill which would prevent that sort of thing. I do not think the men who are now in the position of being caught holding the bag—and I believe that is a good phrase to apply to them—should benefit. I will say that much to the Senator from Kansas. I am not interested in them, but I am interested in the 200,000,000 bushels of surplus wheat that we will have out of the coming harvest and that we will have next year and the year after. I think that is a full answer to the Senator's question. If it is not, I shall be glad to amplify it.

But after the expected surplus wheat is purchased, disregarding that surplus wheat now in the elevators, what is going to be done with it? What are we going to do with the 200,000,000 bushels of surplus wheat a year and the surplus of the other crops? We are going to sell them to the world just as we do now, and as the world's agricultural lands increase in acreage and in production it will become more and more difficult to take care of the surplus crops raised in America. I have not any question about it.

The Senator from Kansas the other day was talking about the crops from Canada. With her more fertile lands, cheaper labor, and lower railroad rates, that competition alone would materially reduce the sale value abroad of American wheat. That is another problem.

In the nature of things, the farm board having bought up 200,000,000 bushels of surplus wheat in excess of any possible consumption in America, must sell it for what it can get, and that means a loss. That loss comes out of the fund. It is only a question of time, long or short, when that fund will be exhausted. I do not think any person can successfully refute that argument.

It is the farmer we are seeking to save; we are going to raise the price to the producer at home; we are not engaged in an effort to crowd the farmer down, as the middlemen do now, but we are going to give the farmer a higher price. In doing this the corporation will have no opportunity whatever to engage in the buying and selling of domestic wheat at a profit, and when it comes to export wheat, of course, it will be sold at a loss and at an increasing loss as the time goes on. So the fund will be exhausted and dried up, and in time there will not be any fund which may be used under the operation of the bill as it comes to us from the other House.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. COPELAND. I do.

Mr. KING. If I understand the Senator from New York, he is criticizing the bill without the debenture feature?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. KING. And he bases his criticism, in part, upon the conclusion which he reaches from an examination of the measure that it will utterly fail to be of any advantage to the farmer; that the $500,000,000 will soon be lost and wasted and consumed in extravagant expenses in the operation of a stupendous machine, which will be built up and manned by from 15,000 to 20,000 employees, so that at the end of a few years the Treasury will be asked to make a larger appropriation, perhaps of $250,000,000 or $500,000,000, and so on ad infinitim?

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator's diagnosis of the situation is absolutely correct.

Mr. COPELAND. Some of us have been criticized by the press, as I have been by the New York press. The press finds fault with the debenture because of its being, as they say, a raid on the Treasury, and I am going to refer to that in a moment; but the press forgets, as the Senator from Utah has brought out, that if there is no way of replenishing the fund when it is used up, the farm board is coming back and asking for a direct appropriation. So, in the last analysis, what difference does it make to the taxpayer whether there is an orderly and permanent arrangement for replenishing the fund, or whether the Appropriations Committee of the Senate and the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives shall recommend the appropriation of more money to replenish it, for it must be replaced if it is to do the work contemplated? If the debenture plan shall be retained in the measure there will be a means of constant renewal of the fund from the collection of the debentures.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not know whether the parliamentary situation will permit, but I should like to say to the Senator from New York that if the debenture plan shall not be incorporated in the bill, and if the situation presented before the Senate will permit, I intend to vote against the bill, because, without the debenture plan, there will be nothing but extravagance, bureaucracy gone mad, and a raid upon the Federal Treasury to the extent approximately of a half billion dollars. The only reason I would vote for the bill at all would be because the debenture plan was in it; and if that shall be taken out, and I have the opportunity, I shall vote against the whole proposition.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator from Maryland, and I shake hands with him across the Chamber. So far as I am concerned, I would not vote for this bill in a thousand years unless it should have in it some means of replenishing the fund. I am absolutely with the Senator from Maryland in that respect.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Will the Senator explain to me in what way the debenture will replenish the fund?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I should welcome the information.

Mr. COPELAND. I will give it to the Senator in just a moment. I wish to express just one other thought, and then I will come to the Senator's question.

In the very nature of the operation contemplated by the House bill the farmer will benefit by the procedure so long as the corporation has any money left, but unless there shall be some means of replenishing the fund, sooner or later it will be exhausted.

Now, we come to the question asked by my genial and distinguished friend from Michigan: How will the fund benefit by the debenture? I am glad the Senator has asked that question, not alone that it is an important one and should be answered but because of a statement so often made in various editorials. I thought I had one here, but that does not matter. The idea is that the poor farmer out in Michigan—of course, there are no poor farmers in Michigan, but a farmer somewhere who is a poor farmer—will sell his hundred bushels of surplus wheat and collect $21. Of course, that is not the way it is going to be done. The surplus wheat is going to be purchased by the farm board or one of its agencies or its agency, so when the wheat is shipped abroad a little debenture slip will not be sent to John Jones at Whitmore Lake, or to Bill Brown at Wolf Lake, but the debenture will go to the farm board; that is what will happen. That is a Government agency.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator means the stabilization corporation?

Mr. COPELAND. The farm board or one of its agencies, such as the stabilization corporation. It will receive the debentures. That is a Government body; it will have its connections with the Treasury and work in cooperation with the Treasury, and the debentures will be handled by the farm board or its agency.

The debentures will be divisible into small units. There are any number of brokers who will be glad to handle them. A New York banker was in my office yesterday and said: "I will gladly take debentures at a reduction of 1 cent on the 21 cents"—a 5 per cent reduction—"and I will sell them at a profit, because the importers will be very glad to save 2 or 3 or 4 per cent in the payment of their import duties."

That is a point I want to make clear to the Senator and I want the country to know it. The debentures in the very nature of things are not going to go to the individual farmer. He is going to be taken care of through the cooperatives and the stabilization corporation. He will get his increased price at home and the corporation will take the $200,000,000 worth of exportable wheat and receive the debentures. If the Government agency receives 20 cents—that is, 21 cents, less the cost of handling—on every bushel of wheat exported, that means a home price of 20 cents more to the farmer who sends his wheat to Europe through his cooperative and through the stabilization corporation.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him further?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does that conclude the Senator's explanation of how the fund is to be replenished under the debenture plan?

Mr. COPELAND. I was going to amplify it somewhat; but what does the Senator have in mind?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I fail to understand how the Senator has yet indicated how the original Federal farm board fund of $500,000,000, which he anticipates will be depleted and exhausted, is to be replenished through the operation of the debenture plan.

Mr. COPELAND. What will become of the proceeds of the sale of the debentures? What will become of them in the opinion of the Senator?

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator has just indicated that the advantage of the debenture will go to the farmer. Under his theory how is the fund to be replenished from the debenture, as the Senator is constantly reiterating that it will be?

Mr. COPELAND. On every bushel of wheat exported there is a debenture given of 21 cents. Is not that correct? Through the agency of the board that 21 cents debenture will be disposed of and go back into the corporation to replace that amount paid the farmer above the unaided market price.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The stabilization corporation?

Mr. COPELAND. To replace in some measure the funds of the stabilization corporation.

So, Mr. President, it is very clear to me, as is intimated by the Senator from Maryland—and I myself so stated in a speech last month—that without some way of replenishing the fund this bill is worthless. The reactionary Republicans—and, of course, I can not now include my genial friend from Kansas in that category, because he has shown himself to be a nonconformist—the reactionary Republicans if they succeed to-day in defeating the debenture plan have once more fooled the poor farmer. At the expense of the taxpayer, who must contribute $500,000,000, they have fooled the poor farmer, because he will have something merely that will tide him over for the next year perhaps, with nothing in the future, and the reactionary Republicans can go home and laugh and say we "kidded" the farmers again.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. It is my opinion, if the debenture plan shall be defeated to-day and the farm relief bill shall be passed without incorporating that plan and the country goes along under that bill for the next two or three years, that at the next presidential election the debenture plan will be found in the Republican platform.

Mr. COPELAND. I think that is true. It is an amazing thing to see Senators in this body across the aisle voting now for this bill without the debenture, when, as the Senator predicts, in 1932 the debenture will be in the platform. There will have to be some tangible demonstration to the farmers of America in 1932, or else they will not reelect a Republican President, a thing which we do not believe will happen anyway.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield further to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. If that condition shall come to pass, it will be very interesting to see many of those who are opposing the debenture at this time throwing back somersaults and explaining how they were mistaken and now they will do something for the farmer under the plan proposed.

Mr. COPELAND. In other words, the Senator means that some Senators on the other side will adopt the debenture only when they are forced to do it. That is right. But, in the meantime, I am afraid that without some method of replenishing the fund, failure is certain. To pass the House bill would be a mere gesture. It will mean the Republican Party has washed its hands of the farmer for the time being. It will brag about its generous gift of $500,000,000, and laugh at him when he comes back for more money.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield for a question.

Mr. ALLEN. In view of the open and almost indecent glee which the Senator from New York and his associates on the other side are exhibiting over the prospect of Republican defeat, I think they really ought to show some consideration for the feelings of the Republican Members here who helped them to administer the defeat. I rise for the purpose of objecting to the indecent display of satisfaction on the Democratic side.

Mr. COPELAND. I can quite understand the attitude of the Senator, because now he is one of those recalcitrant Republicans and naturally he is sensitive about any criticism which is passed upon them. May I say to him that I am not including those who have been long in the progressive fold, and if the Senator has really gone over to that group we will not criticize him; so he need not be disturbed at all about the situation.

What will happen to the farmer, Mr. President, if the House bill becomes a law if no provision is made for replenishing the fund? Gradually the money will disappear, and this great machine will become rusty, creaky in the joints, and impossible of functioning. Then the odium for the failure of the cooperatives and the stabilization corporation will be upon these men who have undertaken to make an unworkable machine work. The odium will be shifted to the cooperative associations. They will be held responsible for the nonrelief of agriculture. The farmers will be accused of inability to manage big business, even with the assistance of the Government; and insolvency is certain.

There might be some advantage in the reduction of fluctuation in prices for a little while; but I shall not be a party to voting for a bill which has in it no means of replenishment of the fund, and which has disaster waiting for it within a very short time after it proceeds to operate.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. May I inquire of the Senator about how much longer he desires to address the Senate?

Mr. COPELAND. I am always glad to yield to my genial friend; and if he will get the others to keep still and not ask any questions, I shall be through very soon. I do want to get through, and I think I can, in 10 or 12 minutes.

In the hearings before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry on farm relief legislation, on page 521, is a very interesting statement made by Louis J. Taber, president of the Grange. He pointed out that when we raise the tariff so high that it becomes protective, we at once divert revenue from the Treasury; and he used practically the same figures that the Senator from California used this morning, showing that when the tariff is raised high enough really to benefit the American manufacturer it is in effect an embargo, and so the revenue drops off, as, for instance, in aluminum. That is a very notable example, where the various changes in the tariff reduced the importations of aluminum kitchenware from $780,000 worth in 1922 to about $72,000 worth in 1927, and we kept out of the Treasury of the United States $391,140 by the increase of the rate on aluminum; and, of course, incidentally the Aluminum Co. of America profited very largely, as the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] knows very well from his investigations.

I ask, Mr. President, that there be included in my remarks without reading—because I know the anxiety of my genial friend from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] to make a speech—pages 521 and 522 of the hearings, as marked.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the statement of Louis J. Taber before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the United States Senate, April 3, 1929]

When we raise the tariff so high that it becomes protective, we at once divert revenue from the Treasury. I am going to take a very conspicuous example. In 1920 we imported into the United States aluminum hollow ware, the kind we farmers use in our kitchens, to the amount of $422,000, and paid an ad valorem tariff of 25 per cent. In 1921 we imported $672,000, and in 1922 we imported $780,000 of aluminum kitchen ware. There was a change in the tariff. In 1925 we imported $126,000, in 1926 we imported $96,000, in 1927 we imported $72,000. But in 1925 the ad valorem equivalent was 77 per cent, in 1926 the ad valorem was 78 per cent, and in 1927 the ad valorem was 77 per cent. In other words, we raised the tariff on aluminum hollow kitchen ware from 25 per cent to 77 per cent ad valorem, and kept out of the United States a large amount of aluminum ware. But that is not the point I want the committee to get. We kept out of the Treasury of the United States $391,140. I am not complaining about a protective tariff that benefits aluminum.

Then we come to Table 2. I just referred to Table 1. In Table 2 I have these figures in regard to pocketknives. In 1920 we imported $585,000 worth of knives, with an ad valorem tariff of 51 per cent; in 1921 we imported $790,000 worth of knives, with an ad valorem tariff of 56 per cent; in 1922, $936,000, with an ad valorem duty of 63 per cent. In 1925 we imported $298,000 worth of pocketknives, but the tariff was 116 per cent. In 1926 we only imported $267,000 worth of knives, and the tariff was 117 per cent. But that is not the thing that I want you to remember. During the first three years under the old tariff law we imported $2,319,000 worth of pocketknives, and we collected $1,200,000 of duty; but under the last three years, under the new tariff act, we only imported $800,000 worth of knives, and we only collected $923,000 in revenue. In other words, the country suffered a loss in revenue to protect the cutlery manufacturers. We diverted from the Treasury $354,784. Again, I say, if we can divert money from the Federal Treasury by building a protective-tariff wall, I insist that we can also divert money from the Federal Treasury to protect agriculture.

I have been milking cows since I was 6 years old, and I am the only man in this room who milked cows last night. The hired man was sick on the farm when I came by was the reason, however. As a dairyman interested in dairying I want to talk about butter. We have had some very interesting experiences with the tariff. We first had a 2-cent tariff, and it was not enough. Then we had an 8-cent tariff, and it was not enough. Then we got a 12-cent tariff. The purpose of the tariff is not for the creation of revenue, but for the stabilization of business and the maintenance of the American standard of living in the American home.

You may say that I have been unfair because I talked about aluminum ware and pocketknives. Under an 8-cent tariff on butter, in 1923, 1924, 1925, and the first three months of 1926 we imported 50,000,000 pounds of butter, valued at $18,000,000. We collected in duty $4,018,000. But in 1926 and 1927, with a 12-cent tariff, we imported only 11,000,000 pounds of butter, valued at $4,000,000, and the revenue collected was $1,400,000. In other words, under the 8-cent tariff the average monthly revenue was $103,000; but under the 12-cent tariff on butter the average monthly revenue was $68,000. In other words, when we raised the tariff on butter to 12 cents, we diverted from the Treasury $734,000.

I am reading these figures simply because I want to indicate that we are not asking the Federal Government to do a single thing it is not now doing. It has provided the drawback for the manufacturer. It has been in operation for half a century. It has provided for remitting the tariff duty on Cuban sugar and other commodities for 19 years. It has provided a tariff to the point of protection, not revenue. A tariff for revenue would mean low tariffs, and large amounts would be imported. A protective tariff builds the wall so high that it restricts the flow, reduces the revenue. So the debenture will only give the export branch of agriculture the same type of protection that other industries have been receiving.

In the days of Alexander Hamilton, when he first proposed what is called the defensive idea, 95 per cent of our revenue came from the tariff. In 1928 about 15 per cent of our revenue came from the tariff. I mention that because they had no income from State taxes, and they utilized the tariff as a producer of revenue. We feel that we are entirely justified in what we ask, and are proceeding on sound business principles and a sound constitutional basis.

Before some one asks me, I want to point out that we favor the export debentures being made good for payment of import duties, because, first, we are accepting a principle of proven constitutionality, which was through the Supreme Court a half century ago; second, that we are giving this protection to the consumer, and it is no more of a subsidy or a bonus than the tariff. It is no more a special favor to agriculture than the remitted tariff duty or the tariff drawback.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from New York does me too much honor. I have not any very definite information about how much profit the Aluminum Co. of America does make, nor, so far as that is concerned, has anybody outside of that corporation. It may, for the matter of that, have been making inordinate profits prior to the increase in duties under the act of 1922. No showing was made to the committee of either House justifying the increase of the duties on aluminum carried in the act of 1922. No showing was made of the cost of production at home as against the cost of production abroad. The representative of the Aluminum Co. of America came before the committee and said, "This is the duty that we had under the act of 1909, and we should like to have the same duty this time"; and they got it.

Mr. COPELAND. And, of course, coming and going, the Aluminum Co. catches the American people, all the time shaping legislation so that its profits are increased; and yet the poor farmer, when he comes and asks for bread, gets a tariff on brick.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. And possibly the largest individual owner of the stock of the Aluminum Trust is the man who wrote the letter upon which the President decided that the debenture was a bad thing!

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator for his illuminating statement.

Mr. President, my State stands eleventh in agricultural products in this country. It is exceeded only by Texas because of its cotton, California because of its fruits, Iowa and Illinois for their corn, and it runs shoulder to shoulder with Kansas, Minnesota, North Carolina, Oklahoma, Wisconsin, and Ohio. Any one of this group exceeds my State by only $25,000,000; so, you see, New York is a great agricultural State. But all of the agricultural interests in my State are opposed to this bill unless it has in it some means of replenishment of the fund. I have yet to have one word from my State from a farmer or a farmer organization asking me to vote for the House bill. There is unanimity of opposition to the bill; and I think if you go to the well-informed farmers in any State you will find the same feeling regarding the proposed bill.

Mr. President, Senators laugh at me sometimes because I show so much interest in the farmer and in the farm. They want to know if my colleague and I raise our crops in window boxes! As a matter of fact, there is no State in the Union so dependent upon the farmer as the State of New York. There is no city in the Union more dependent upon the farmers than the city of New York. You do not think of my city as a manufacturing city. You think of it only as a financial center. When you want to borrow money you go to New York. When my distinguished friend the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] wants really to emphasize a point, he condemns Wall Street. It is the financial operations of my city that he has in mind.

You never think of New York as a manufacturing city. Let me tell you: In bulk and value, the manufactures of New York City exceed the combined products of Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Cincinnati, St. Louis, Milwaukee, Detroit, and Boston. Think of it! Six billions of dollars of manufactured products coming out of New York! Where do they go?

I rarely see any overalls worn on Broadway—and you can see almost everything that is worn there now! We sell the overalls. These products go to the farmers of the country. Half the manufactured steel is sold on the farms—fence wire, plowshares, agricultural implements, crowbars, chains, pickaxes; you know the things that are sold on the farm. There can be no continued prosperity in any city of America unless there is prosperity upon the farms of America; and so far as I am concerned, Mr. President, I am entirely unwilling to vote for any measure which has not in it some honest hope of relief for agriculture.

The House bill, in my judgment, will not give that relief. We must have a means of continuing the operations of the farm board by a replenishment of its funds. In my opinion, every Senator in this body coming from a great city—coming from Boston or New York or Philadelphia or Pittsburgh or Detroit or Chicago or St. Louis or Los Angeles or San Francisco or any other city—has a direct interest in what happens to this bill. If it is passed as it comes from the House, there will be greater discontent and greater financial stress upon the farms than we have had in the past.

As I see it, it is for us to-day to determine the fate of American agriculture; and, my friends, when I think about the farmer I think about the farmer's wife and the farmer's children. I was born on a farm. My relatives are farmers. I know the sacrifices that have been made by the farm women of America. Mr. Choate once said, speaking at a Pilgrim dinner, "I do not like to hear about the sacrifices made by the Pilgrim fathers. The Pilgrim mothers made all the sacrifices that the Pilgrim fathers did, and, besides that, had to put up with the Pilgrim fathers." [Laughter.]

If we have an interest in the welfare of the farm home, of the women and children in those homes, and a real interest in agriculture, we are going to pass here a bill which has in it hope of perpetuity. As I see it, there is no such hope in the bill that comes from the House; and, as I have said, if there is no debenture placed upon this bill, or other means of replenishing the fund, my conscience will not permit me to vote for it.

But with the debenture feature added, I believe that any Senator who is anxious to help the agricultural producers—I do not care whether they are those who till the broad acres of the West, or the produce raisers of the South, or the growers of the fruit and perishables of our country—must realize that the prosperity of those producers, whether they labor in orchard or garden or field, depends upon the passage of a bill which has in it hope of perpetuity. Therefore I appeal to Senators to reject the conference report and include the debenture in the bill.

Mr. ALLEN obtained the floor.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, who has the floor?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas has the floor.

Mr. ALLEN. Does the Senator wish to have me yield for a speech or for a question?

Mr. HAWES. I desired to ask the Senator from New York a question, but he yielded the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield for the Senator from Missouri to ask the Senator from New York a question?

Mr. ALLEN. I think not. I think that Senator has occupied all the time to which he is entitled.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield for that purpose?

Mr. ALLEN. I think not. I am satisfied with those present. I thank the Senator just the same.

I will yield to a question of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, I will direct some questions to the Senator from Kansas later.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas has the floor.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I think it would not be a bad plan to go back to the beginning. We have been discussing a great many things during the last few days that have had nothing to do with farm legislation.

To begin with, there were some insinuations touching the sincerity of the Republicans and the sincerity of the President. In my very first experience in this body, one day I heard upon this side of the Chamber a faint shriek of pain arising from a Senator who discovered that he had been "deceived" by the President, and immediately another Senator arose, weeping softly, and then soon I saw the able senior Senator from Arkansas, with his eyes moist, come over and begin holding hands; and in a very short time we were carrying on a "lodge of sorrow" and shedding crocodile tears over some alleged insincerities that had just been discovered between the attitude of the President in the campaign and his attitude in his message. So I think it might be well to go back to that campaign attitude, since it has occupied two-thirds of the time of this discussion.

Yesterday when the able Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] was speaking he assumed a hurt attitude because somebody accused him of insincerity and inconsistency. I give every man a perfect right to be inconsistent. I give to every man a perfect right to change his mind, but I grant to no man the unchallenged privilege to be insincere or to change his mind or to be inconsistent and then seek to make it appear that he alone is consistent.

In the ablest speech, probably, of the recent campaign—if it was not the ablest, then surely it was next to the ablest—the Senator from Idaho was discussing the Republican policies and the Republican pledges and the statements of the Republican candidate. Having gone over the entire range of topics discussed during the period, and arriving at the question of farm legislation, he said:

> And lastly there comes this question of the surplus of wheat and pork and cotton, and this has been the difficult problem. This has been the matter about which sincere and honest men have disagreed. * * * The proposal with reference to the surplus is that of creating a board with authority and with power and with a revolving fund sufficient to enable it to assist in marketing the surplus according to the best business principles and under the best circumstances designed to bring the best price possible to the farmer.

Then there was applause. The Senator from Idaho continued:

These are the principles around which, as I understand, it is proposed to organize the problem of farm relief. And I repeat, to working it out Mr. Hoover with his experience and his acknowledged ability has given his pledge to the American people.

This was the discussion of the able Senator from Idaho in that address in Minneapolis, which stands out as one of the greatest political speeches of the period; and having said that touching his indorsement of the abilities of the President, he added this very generous statement:

Bear in mind that Mr. Hoover has never set himself to the solution of any kind of an economic problem that he has not made good.

And, adding tribute to tribute, he said:

I ask in all sincerity, Has there ever stood before the American people, for the exalted office of the Presidency, considering the questions with which we have to deal, one more competent, more experienced, of wider knowledge, or of higher standing than Herbert Hoover?

In October, having lunched with the President, so the New York Times states, the Senator from Idaho issued this statement:

Unless the short session takes up the subject and concludes satisfactory legislation upon it, I am thoroughly in favor of an extra session of Congress. I would like to see the session called at once and, first, pass a tariff bill with a special view of increasing duties upon farm products; second, pass a marketing bill establishing a more satisfactory marketing system, so as to enable the farmers to market their products without being to the enormous expense which is now necessarily incurred—a bill of this nature is now pending in the Senate. Third, create a farm board with ample authority and with an ample revolving fund to assist the farmer in marketing his surplus in accordance with sound business principles. I think there are three propositions in the question of farm relief which can be covered by a special session so as to enable the farmer to get the benefit of the legislation for the next year's crop. As I see it, we ought to have better protection for his products.

That is one.

We ought to have a better marketing system.

That is two.

We ought to have a farm board with authority and with funds to cooperate in disposing of his surplus.

That is three.

Where is the debenture?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. In a moment. The able Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], Mr. President, whose interesting speech this forenoon I regard as the longest and the highest flight of indignation to which I have listened in a long while, also called into question all of those who had had the temerity to criticize a Senator for apparent inconsistency. I have not meant to criticize him. I merely said that when it comes to a discussion of the inconsistency of this case, the guilt is not ours, and the President has not changed his mind or his position. If any change has been made, it has been made in the mind of the Senator from Idaho, if we are to take what he said in the campaign as a sincere expression of that which he desires in the way of legislation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. ALLEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I only wanted to call attention to the fact that in the Minneapolis speech I specifically stated that I was not stating my views upon farm relief.

Mr. ALLEN. I think the Senator said, "My views are already well known," at which there was laughter, so the press reports.

Mr. BORAH. No; the press does not report anything of the kind.

Mr. ALLEN. That is my recollection.

Mr. BORAH. As usual, the Senator is in error.

Mr. ALLEN. Yesterday the press was referred to, and the able Senator from Idaho, having proclaimed that he had read a hundred editorials, immediately spoke of the billingsgate of the modern editor, and the able Senator from California earlier to-day referred to "the servile press."

I have known for a good many years the patient publisher. It is the policy of some statesmen to condemn us whenever we do not agree with them. But I have always observed that, by and large, we keep along with the public. No one is more thoroughly interested in the continued success and good favor of his clients than is the publisher, because all of the people within the zone of his paper, as a general thing, he hopes some day to make his readers. So I have never quite understood, whenever there has been an expression of difference from the attitude which a man in public life takes, this sudden resentment of the politician, and his readiness to cast the blame for all of his actions upon the press, or, if not to cast the blame, then at least to cast reflection that will color with suspicion their criticisms.

There have been a great many statements from the press touching the action of this body in introducing the debenture in the farm bill. I have here a digest of a great many papers covering the entire country—the New England division, the Middle Atlantic division, the South Atlantic division, the east North Central, the west North Central, the east South Central, the west South Central, the west North Central, the east North Central, the Mountain States, and the Pacific coast.

I discover that the "servile press" of California has so expressed itself against this measure that papers having a combined circulation of 1,062,000 have expressed themselves opposed to the debenture, while those which have favored it get down to about 30,000. Of course, that is just a mere matter of circulation. All these one million and odd, all these thirty thousand and odd, are just readers of the paper and incidentally voters in the election. All their support of a publisher means is that they have a reasonable faith in his intention, a certain belief that they are getting their money's worth from his news columns. But I find that nearly all of them reflect from year to year the opinions of the communities in which they are published. So, when we take this entire digest, beginning in New England and closing in California, we find that papers having a circulation of 10,492,400 have expressed themselves as in opposition to the debenture, while those having a circulation of 366,000 only have expressed themselves as in favor of the coalition between the Democratic Party and the so-called insurgent Republicans.

In their expressions, Mr. President, there is a note, not of billingsgate, certainly not of servility, but an honest expression of opinion on the part of those representatives of the public business who are at least as thoroughly interested in the continued prosperity of this country as are the Members of this body.

I read a typical expression:

[From the Des Moines Sunday Register, May 19, 1929]

The farm West has never been for the debenture; why should the farm West invite another farm bill failure by insisting on it?

The fact is the Senate, which has voted the debenture into the bill, is not for the debenture. The debenture is merely a stalking horse for those who wish for one reason or another to tie the President's hands.

If a die-in-the-ditch stand was to be made for anything, why was not the equalization fee revived? The farm West was for the fee and would be for it now. Why drop the fee and turn to the debenture, if we are to challenge the administration program?

But why challenge the administration program when the administration program goes a long ways, goes far enough probably to solve the farm problem for States like Iowa, and to put the wheat and cotton States on the way to recovery?

Everybody believes it to be President Hoover's purpose to name a strong farm board. Such a board will at once stop the violent breaks in market prices at harvest and husking time. With such a board set up and farm cooperatives organized it will be comparatively easy to settle on the best way to dispose of our surplus crops in the European market so as not to break the home price.

President Hoover promised to call Congress in extra session for the farm against the advice of many party leaders. He called Congress in extra session for the farm, and in the plainest way possible urged that the work of the session be confined to the farm problem.

Why should the farm West, without waiting to see what he can do and will do, try to balk him by voting the debenture into the bill, when in every test in the last eight years the farm West has been for the equalization fee and not for the debenture?

Why should the farm West chance defeat for the whole farm program again by insisting on something it has never affirmatively demanded nor advocated nor voted for?

Mr. President, that is a very able editorial from the Des Moines Sunday Register of Des Moines, Iowa, a paper having, in the State of Iowa, a circulation of practically 250,000. Here is another one:

[From the Des Moines Tribune-Capital, May 18, 1929]

But the debate is largely academic, for the debenture will not be accepted by the House nor by the President and it will not be in the farm bill when it comes up for final passage. Nor will the farm Senators who supported it stand out in a die-in-the-ditch fight for it. For very few men in Congress really believe in the debenture. It is direct subsidy out of the Treasury, mainly to wheat and cotton.

If we look at it selfishly, Iowa is not a wheat nor cotton State and there is no annual surplus of corn in the United States. What Iowa wants is a farm bill that will stabilize marketing and protect the farm in the "home market." Paying subsidies to our exporters will never solve our problem, however acceptable it may be to the exporters.

I am inclined to think at this hour that editor may be a bad prophet, but he is a good logician. I could go on for the remainder of the afternoon, reading excerpts from the farm press and from the commercial press, literally hundreds of them which disapprove of the action of this body, which contain no word of servility, which contain no word of billingsgate, but which do appeal upon the highest plane of public purpose for an opportunity to enact farm legislation in this session of the Congress.

I have here a letter from a farmer, Mr. Ralph W. Cone, who lives in Rozel, Kans., a very able farmer. There is only one objection to asking some Senators here to accept the advice of Mr. Cone, as I see it. There is only one reason why I hesitate to name him here. Mr. Cone is a successful farmer! He said:

The attitude of the farm organization heads opposing the President's plan does not seem to me to have the backing they indicate. I believe the feeling is that President Hoover should have the opportunity to carry into effect the plans that won the votes. As he wisely says, that plan should later be supplemented as experience suggests. Don't undertake too much at the start. Elaborate schemes frequently develop unsuspected weaknesses. The price-fixing, bonus-giving plans of Cuba and various European countries with regard to sugar, of Brazil as to coffee, ought to be a warning to support the President's opposition to putting the Government into business.

Here is an expression from Mr. J. M. Blair, of Lyons, Kans., who is a practical grain dealer and a miller, and in addition owns some wheat farms:

Wheat touched the 75-cent point in central Kansas to-day, and I know that you realize what this means to Kansas. I was mighty glad to see that you voted against the debenture idea all the way through, as I believe that this is the thing that is doing more than anything else to force the market down. The trade realized the cut in railroad rates was immediately passed along to the buyer on the other side, and they know this will be the actual effect in practice of the debenture plan if it is carried through. It will automatically tend to reduce the value of our wheat by just the amount of the debenture and the foreigner will get the benefit and we stand the loss. There is a sharp feeling of resentment going through the country against the Senate's position on insisting on the debentures and it looks like the opposition Senators were just trying to crucify President Hoover on the political cross and let the farmers and the grain trade pay the bill.

THE LYONS FLOUR MILLING CO.,
J. M. BLAIR, Manager.

Now at least I wish to say to the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] that that is not a cowardly insinuation. That is as cold and ruthless a charge, backed up by what appears to be ample evidence, as ever was uttered in public.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. ALLEN. I yield.

Mr. NORBECK. How does the Senator harmonize that with the fact that some Senators voted against the same plan that was submitted by President Coolidge? Was it malice at that time, too?

Mr. ALLEN. I do not know what it was at that time. I was not present. Some thought it was. However, I pass no judgment because at that time, as I said, I was an absentee.

Here is a sensible observation:

With the two days advance in the wheat market the morale of the farmer begins to improve already, and if Congress can affect a stabilization of the present price through the Federal farm board's operations sufficient to permit the farmer to have a little return about his expenses for his season's labors, I believe his confidence in the board and the stabilization corporation will grow sufficient to make it possible to regulate production in some degree if necessary to affect continued stabilization in succeeding crops.

That is exactly what we are trying to do by this bill. This letter is from a farmer, Mr. Harry L. Hartshorn, director of the Farmers' Cooperative Grain Dealers' Association of Kansas, who believes absolutely that the legislation we have undertaken here and which is voiced in the conference report is the legislation which the farmer is expecting, which he is desiring, and which will be the beginning of intelligent organization for the benefit of the farming business.

Here is a letter from Mr. Samuel R. Guard. A great many of you know who Samuel R. Guard is. He can not be accused of being a servile editor. Samuel R. Guard is the owner and editor of the Breeders' Gazette, one of the outstanding publications that has for its interest the agricultural life of the country. Mr. Guard has written me that he has recently returned from a trip of 3,000 miles through the West, South, and the Middle West, and on that trip he investigated the sentiment of the farmers. He says:

The common working farmer himself—

I ask Senators to observe that classification because he is really the farmer we are seeking to reach through the benefits of the legislation—

The common working farmer himself, as I have talked to him, from here to the Rocky Mountains, is in vast majority wholly friendly to Mr. Hoover and has no doubt but that the present administration will soon place the agricultural industry on a basis of equal opportunity with any other industry. He is quite willing to be patient. In fact, he feels pretty well satisfied with himself as he is, and with his business as it is to-day. I think that this common farmer has a very much better understanding of the Hoover idea than the farm leaders do.

Mr. President, during the many hours this question has been debated, as I said, very seldom upon the merits, it has been debated almost wholly upon the subject as to whether the program announced by the President and visualized by the report from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry is consistent. The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] this morning spoke of it as the "Jardine" bill. He might just as well have called it the McNary-Haugen bill with the equalization fee left out, because in the structure and in the purpose of the farm legislation the Jardine bill, the McNary-Haugen bill, and the present bill are all similar except in respect to those particular provisions that offer artifice.

So there is nothing to be said against this bill merely because Secretary Jardine, whose life has been given to the study of agriculture, whose record is a record of proud accomplishment as the president of an agricultural college, and as the head of an experimental institution for agriculture—there is nothing against this bill in saying that the ex-Secretary of Agriculture may have believed in it. Many others believe in it. The President believes in it. The country believes in it. And Senators who insist upon their ideas because they are not satisfied will find when they get back home how thoroughly the country does believe in it and how absolutely the country is going to hold them responsible for the defeat of the agricultural program which now stands menaced by defeat at this hour in this body.

I have heard, as I said, a great deal of discussion upon the question of sincerity and insincerity. I desire to present, just briefly before I close, a discussion of the debenture upon its merits. It is a somewhat technical discussion, but I did not think there would be any objection to having in the record of this debate a technical discussion of the merits of the debenture. No attempt is made to discuss other than the market wisdom of debentures.

When the special session of Congress convened on April 15, called for the express purpose of considering farm legislation, contract grain in the various markets was as follows:

Chicago July wheat	$1.26½
Winnipeg July wheat	1.29¼
Liverpool July wheat	1.34
Buenos Aires June wheat	1.10½
Chicago July corn	.98
Chicago July rye	1.03½

Keep in mind that the inexperienced minds often refer to Liverpool as indicative of the world price of wheat and apparently as if a world price was some intangible but stable thing. On the contrary, a world price is only the current meeting point of the judgment of thousands of merchants and dealers abroad. Every one of these dealers has to adapt his buying policies with great caution, in self-preservation.

In fact, the unsettlement which followed the war and the money exchange fluctuations and the effect of various legislative incursions into wheat, flour, and bread control in various countries abroad, has resulted in greatly curtailing the capital resources of milling and grain trades of the Old World, and made them exceptionally timid, and unable to exercise their usual support by size of aggregate purchases.

On April 15, by public utterances which reached the front pages of our own press, and by cable also abroad, there began successively the emphasis on a depressing surplus of old wheat left in the United States and the necessity of moving this out of the way of a coming new crop although that new crop was at least two months away, and sometimes in the past unfavorable weather has often reduced the expected quantity of new crop.

Even yet all of the hazards that menace this year's crop of wheat have not been passed.

Up till then there was at home and abroad a fairly general faith that a farm board, promptly established, with adequate powers, and administered with strong business judgment would help to sustain a fair level of prices. The statistical presence of the old crop surplus had been known for months but on this confidence that a way might be found to offset the usual depression of such a surplus, price levels at home and abroad had continued on a fairly stable basis for many months. In the United States especially our domestic consumption of forty to fifty million bushels a month had proceeded month after month on a level substantially above any export relation with European markets and with a price level which can not fairly be stated to have been depressed, say, around $1.25 Chicago basis plus premiums for milling qualities.

The public stress laid on the surplus was not good national market sense. The effect of this constant emphasis on the surplus which must be marketed was to undermine almost immediately the buying confidence at home and abroad which had maintained these price levels, and introduced doubt in the buyers' minds, and led to the liquidation of purchases of grain which might have continued for months except for this undermining of confidence. This grew worse as it dawned on dealers and millers at home and abroad that the Senate of the United States was soberly discussing, under the name of debentures, an export premium or a forcing of our surplus into markets already adequately supplied with wheat abroad.

When the Senate of the United States by actually passing the debenture plan aroused a fear that such an export premium would be put in operation to force our surplus into these foreign markets, there developed almost a panic in wheat circles abroad.

The day following the announcement of the adoption by the Senate of the debenture provision the closing prices for the same contract qualities were:

Chicago July wheat	$1.08
Winnipeg July wheat	1.12¼
Liverpool July wheat	1.16
Buenos Aires June wheat	1.00
Chicago July corn	.88
Chicago July rye	.87

Through all of this time, as at present, Canada particularly, and also Argentina and to a less extent Australia, have all had surpluses from the last crop to market. Ordinarily these surpluses might proceed to market in a rather stable and restrained manner, but with this evidence these countries began to press their sales on the European market in order to secure purchasers before the stimulated offering of United States surplus reached Europe.

Therefore the decline contained under these various influences with foreign buyers afraid to enter into contracts, until three weeks later these prices had fallen further as follows. On May 31:

Chicago July wheat	$0.98
Winnipeg July wheat	1.07
Liverpool July wheat	1.10
Buenos Aires June wheat	.93
Chicago July corn	.81
Chicago July rye	.76

From this point there has been a gradual recovery under what may be reasonably assumed to be the evidence that the debenture plan would not be allowed to go into effect, and the whole price level has moderately recovered under a rather timid revival of confidence which followed the bringing back to this body of a conference report without the debenture.

Now, it seems quite reasonable from this course of prices timed with the event, that the practical judgment of those who must buy and use grain was that the effect of export debentures on United States surplus, intended to stimulate the dumping of an accumulated surplus beyond the capacity of absorption by foreign markets already adequately supplied week by week, suspended the usual demand, and under the usual law of supply and demand prices fell.

As prices fell, both Italy and France, in order to cushion the fall in price levels as affecting their own producers, applied overnight and without notice, as their laws allowed them to do, an advance in the import duty on wheat. The immediate application, thus without notice, of protective action on the part of those two countries indicates quite clearly what would probably be their action if export premiums were paid to stimulate the dumping into foreign markets of our surplus. There is a vast difference between stimulating such marketing into unwilling markets and allowing them to move in the natural play of competitive judgments and competitive qualities.

Every country practically in the world, including our own, has antidumping legislative authority which can be applied on short notice, and in most countries without any previous notice whatever. Manifestly those countries are not going to say in advance what their policies will be, but Great Britain, which is the largest single market for imported wheat abroad, interested as it is in the British Empire federation with two important wheat raisers—Canada and Australia—will very likely not allow their markets to be undermined by our Government-stimulated competition with the product of their own Empire. This position of France and Italy and other markets against the undermining of bounty-stimulated exports is shown in their recent tariff action.

It is more than likely that most or all of the large importing countries of the world would immediately apply the antidumping provisions of their laws and close their markets entirely on any terms to our products which bear a Government-export bounty. The reasonably expected result of any serious application of debenture premiums on exports applied particularly to wheat would be that we would find the markets of the world closed to us entirely on any terms. So far from the debentures establishing a domestic premium over the world basis, we would find the whole world basis broken down as it has been even under the serious discussion of the possibility of such debenture premium on exports, and we might find ourselves without even the normal market for our surplus.

Senators have inquired here to-day why we jump at the conclusion that this bill will be vetoed by the President. My friends, I jump at the conclusion upon the strength of the President's own statement to us, upon the faith I have in his intelligent judgment touching economic results, upon the trust I place in his realization that it is his duty to save the American farmers from a catastrophe.

In trying to forecast what other countries would do, what would the United States do under its present legislative authority if Canada should, as it can do overnight, put an export debenture bounty on wheat from Canada into the United States, say, of 42 cents, so as to allow Canadian wheat to enter our markets? What the United States would do under those circumstances is quite easy to imagine, and as well what other countries will do under similar circumstances requires only the application of ordinary judgment to forecast.

Leaving all other considerations aside, the export bounty debenture plan is the worst from a national marketing standpoint that can possibly be devised and would be destructive of prices everywhere without ever reflecting a premium on domestic levels.

There is a broad philosophy in grain prices. Eighty per cent of the world's grain crop matures in the three months of June, July, and August. That accumulation of maturing harvests must be carried through 12 months and be fairly distributed and consumed. Suitable machinery to do this has been enlisted through the future-trading markets, involving large investments by our people, and the burden of storage, insurance, and interest arrangements is shifted to the warehousemen and merchants by making the buying easy and expeditious. It has been able in the past to attract sentiment enough to offset harvest surpluses and accumulations. Over an extended period we always have years of poor crops somewhere in the world, during which price levels are helped by the absorption of the accumulated surpluses. The problem is to carry such surpluses on as buoyant a price level as possible until consumption and crop shrinkage somewhere may overtake and clear the surplus situation. Confidence and sentiment as to price levels are often effective against statistical evidences in maintaining buoyant prices, and that never was so clearly shown as in the last eight months. To destroy that confidence is immediately to undermine price levels at home and abroad. We need a strong farm board. We need their guidance in organization. We need their aid in facilitating orderly marketing by the farm itself and their strengthening effect on sentiment, which carries price levels on accumulated surpluses in storage centers.

Mr. President, it is not fair to agriculture for us to say in this body that agriculture alone is the only business in the world which will not yield to intelligent organization. There is tremendous strength in it. If it had not been for the latent strength in agriculture it could not have withstood for the last 10 years the constant defamation of it by its own friends; it could not for the last 10 years have withstood the continual declaration that it was a "busted" industry and that land was worthless.

Mr. President, what we need to do at this hour in this Congress is to make this beginning of an intelligent agricultural organization and by future judgments, as in the case of the Federal reserve, perfect the system until we place before the American people that which will be a worthy expression of our honest and constructive belief, unpoisoned by the opportunities which are provided for interparty bickerings and assaults.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I do not want to demonstrate that wasting time of the Senate is a bipartisan performance. I am willing to yield that palm to the junior Senator from Kansas. He has taken up time to demonstrate that the grasshopper is not the only plague that has come out of that State. [Laughter.] He admonishes us to have an honest conviction, but the only conviction he has is what the President wants.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, yes; I yield.

Mr. ALLEN. I thought the Senator would. As a matter of fact, I want to clear up that apprehension which exists in his mind, which is the second time he has expressed it to me. I want to make this broad statement in general: First, that the President does not expect me to think his thoughts.

Mr. CARAWAY. If he does, he will be fooled.

Mr. ALLEN. He has granted me the privilege of thinking my own; but, if ever at any time in this body I am reduced to the basis of taking either the thoughts of the junior Senator from Arkansas or the thoughts of the President of the United States, I shall unhesitatingly select the thoughts of the President. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARAWAY. Well, the Senator will have his choice; but he must take somebody's opinion; he did not bring one here with him. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, in that respect the Senator from Arkansas and myself can go along comfortably, neither nagging the other.

Mr. CARAWAY. What was that?

Mr. ALLEN. What I was seeking to introduce into the mind of the Senator from Arkansas was the thought that possibly the reflection he cast upon my thinking apparatus might be a reflection upon his own. Does the Senator get that?

Mr. CARAWAY. I was not casting any reflection on the Senator's thinking apparatus; I never accused him of having one. [Laughter.]

However, Mr. President, what I started to say—and of course, I realize it is a waste of time of the Senate to say it—is that the only appeal the Senator makes is that his colleagues shall stand by the President; that the President has thought out this problem, and, therefore, we should leave it to the President. If that be so, I do not know why we should have been called upon to act upon the pending legislation at all. If it is the view of the Senator from Kansas, borrowed, no doubt, that the duty of Congress is to legislate only what the President shall direct, of course, Kansas is very well represented in the Senate.

What I started to say is that whatever information the President has about the debenture he received from two men, whom I shall mention in a few moments. The Agricultural Committee had agreed unanimously to report the bill. Whatever may be said on the floor, the only reservations made were by four Senators, who said, "If the President changes his mind, we will change ours." They are sitting here; they know that is true, and they will not rise and deny it. The only reservation they made was that they would change whenever the President changed. The committee then sent a delegation to the President to ascertain what he thought, and the President said, "I do not know anything about this proposition." The committee is here that went to see him, and they know that is true. They asked him what he thought about the debenture plan, and he said, "I do not know anything about it." He was exactly as informed as is the Senator from Kansas.

The President had time to spend six weeks on a "good will" tour to South America after he had been elected President of the United States; he had time to fish in Florida for a couple of weeks after he had been elected President of the United States; he had time, for four weeks, to hunt good fishing places in Virginia and Maryland after he had been elected President of the United States; but he did not have time, according to his own declaration, to give thought to that which means life or death to 30,000,000 American people. Yet the Senator from Kansas says that is the kind of intelligence he wants to follow.

The President said, "I will take my adviser's opinion and thus find out what I should say about the debenture plan." One of his advisers is the present Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Hyde. I challenge any Senator on the floor of the Senate to read what the Secretary of Agriculture said to the Committee on Agriculture and know what he thought about any farm problem. I dare any Senator on the other side to stand up and say what it was the Secretary of Agriculture thought about any plan for farm relief which was pending before the Congress of the United States. And yet, and yet, and yet the "master mind" that we are asked now by the Senator from Kansas to follow said, "I will take my opinion from this man," who did not have any opinion of his own.

He took one other man's opinion. He took the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon. I concede that Mr. Mellon is an able man. I think he knows more about oil than anybody living, except Doheny and Sinclair and Albert Fall. [Laughter.] I admit that he knows a good deal more about money that most of us. I am not saying that in his own field he is not a man of great ability; but I do say that the mere fact that he knows that if you get 10 per cent on your investment, plus 100 per cent, you will eventually get rich, does not make him an expert on farm problems.

That is the information that the President said he was going to rely upon. He said he would submit this question to his experts, and he sent their data along with his opinion. But let us just look at the opinion of one of the experts. I am sure it came from there.

One of the 10 reasons given by the President was the following:

> The plan would require a substantial increase in taxes, as no such expenditure or depletion of revenues as this plan implies could be paid from marginal income of the Government, more particularly in view of the very large increased expenditures imposed by the naval program, flood control, and other branches of farm relief.

The Treasury, according to Mr. Mellon, could not support this plan, which would drain the Treasury to the extent of about $75,000,000, according to the experts offered to us by the Government itself. It could not support this plan; and yet you are asked to vote for a plan that will require the Treasury to support a plan calling for $500,000,000 to start with!

I know that I am not as wise as those who trade off their intelligence to the President and allow him to vote them; but I am curious to know how a Treasury that could not support an expenditure of $75,000,000 can support an expenditure of $500,000,000 to start with. Even the Senator from Kansas—no, he would not have any trouble with it; but anybody else would.

I have in my hand an article from that inspired Republican propaganda organization known as the Associated Press [laughter], which says:

> Treasury pledges farm relief cost. Proposed $500,000,000 appropriation easily made available, official reports.

And, further, the article says:

> A Treasury official said to-day, "This prospect of Congress appropriating the money before taking its recess would in no way disrupt the financial plans of the Government."

At least, when we are asked to believe both of those statements, everybody but the Senator from Kansas may have some trouble with it—that the Treasury could not support an expenditure of $75,000,000, and yet, without disturbing its arrangements at all, it can, as an initial expenditure, carry $500,000,000! We are asked to base our whole vote, and risk the future happiness and contentment and prosperity of ourselves and 30,000,000 of our fellow American citizens, upon the advice of this man who says in one breath that the Treasury can not support an expenditure of $75,000,000, and in the next, "If you will just take my plan, we will offer $500,000,000."

Mark you, what was the change made by the House in this bill? It carried when it passed the Senate a revolving fund made immediately available for taking care of this crop of $100,000,000. The price of wheat broke and the House wrote into the bill four hundred millions more, making it $500,000,000—for what purpose? For no purpose other than to take care of this one wheat emergency. To take care of the present depressed prices of wheat you are going to put up $500,000,000. Well, if the others who are engaged in agriculture should get a fair proportion along with the wheat growers, the initial expenditure of a billion dollars proposed by the Senator from Alabama was a mere bagatelle. You will have to put up more than a billion dollars upon this plan of farm relief that they tell us now embodies all the wisdom of all the ages.

How much are you expecting to supply to the people in the South who grow cotton? How much are the fruit growers to get? How much are the corn growers to get? How much are the hog raisers, the sheep raisers, the cattle raisers, and all the varied farm industries of this country to get if wheat alone is entitled to half a billion dollars to take care of one crop?

I know, Mr. President, that this proposition is neither sustained nor defeated by mere denunciation. If it were, I should yield the palm already, well earned, to the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. ALLEN]. He announced that he was going to debate this proposition upon an intelligent basis, and then he used nearly all the time of the Senate that remained to show that some Senators on his side were inconsistent—that is, that they did not agree with him. If he were to take a census of all the intelligent people of the United States, he would find that all of them were inconsistent and did not agree with him.

He read a letter and said that he hated to mention the name, because the man was a successful farmer. I did not know it was a crime, even in Kansas, to be a successful farmer; but I am not going to argue about that. This successful farmer did not believe in the debenture plan, and he gave his reason for not believing in it; and that reason was one that Mr. Hoover had planted among his 10 objections to it. I presume the successful farmer borrowed it from that source. I think he ought to have at least given Mr. Hoover credit for it, just as I think Mr. Hoover ought to have given Mr. Coolidge credit for it, because Mr. Coolidge first sent it to the Senate in his veto of the McNary-Haugen bill; and I think that Mr. Coolidge ought to have given Mr. Mellon credit for it, because it was born of his fertile brain.

I do not know, and no one knows, what is to be the fate of this bill. We are told that if we vote down the conference report it means the death of agricultural legislation at this session of Congress. Well, that rests with those gentlemen over there. It rests with the other body of this Congress, which undertakes to gag its Members and prevent an intelligent expression of opinion. It strikes me, at least, that if the matter is so susceptible of proof, and since the majority in both the Senate and the House is overwhelmingly Republican, and if you are willing to trust to the integrity and the intelligence of your own membership, you would have no objection to having it submitted to that court of reason that you say would disapprove the plan.

I am not going to criticize the conferees in this matter. I do know that there is a vicious procedure in both the Senate and the House of naming, sometimes, as conferees Members who are uncompromisingly opposed to the provision in conference. It serves notice on the other body that "If you will hold out a day or two we will yield, because we have no heart in the fight, and we are not in sympathy with it." I know there are two names upon that conference report that never would have been signed to it if sugar instead of cotton had been the article in question. Everybody knows that; and I know this: If the Senate disapproves this conference report, and—while I am not going to suggest it—if conferees are appointed who are in sympathy with it, I know it is going to get a vote in the other House.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CARAWAY. I shall be through in just one minute, if the Senator wants the floor.

The thing that is so obviously true—and with that I am through—is this: The debenture plan is only an ultimate plan. If you believe that the President's plan will succeed, you have no reason then to fear, because the debenture plan is included in it, because the President is going to name the board, and the Senator from Kansas has just assured us that the President is going to name a patriotic and an able board. Of course, I presume he suggested the names to the President, or else he would not know who it is that the President is going to name, although the papers two or three days ago carried the statement that the President was trading on the membership of the farm board to get votes in the Senate to defeat this plan.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CARAWAY. I do.

Mr. KING. Apropos of what the Senator has just said, I am advised that Mr. Hartshorn, an editor or writer from whom the Senator from Kansas [Mr. ALLEN] read, is an applicant for a position upon the board; and my information is that the two Senators from Kansas, as well as other representatives favoring the bill, have indorsed Mr. Hartshorn, and, perhaps, have visited the White House in his behalf.

Mr. CARAWAY. Well——

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; well? [Laughter.]

Mr. CARAWAY. At least that is one good guess that the Senator from Utah has made. I have no knowledge of who the members are to be; but, of course, the Senator from Utah named one, if the two distinguished Senators from Kansas can dictate the choice. Whether or not he is an able man I do not know. If his editorial was an example of it, I should not think the farmers would be overly fortunate in his naming; but that has nothing to do with his naming, anyway. It is a political trade, of course; and here are Senators, men who had promised to the farmers when they plead for their support that they would be true to their needs and their demands, swapping them off merely for the right of naming a friend on the board!

The junior Senator from Kansas, I remember, in his other tirade, said he was willing to go back and face the people who sent him here. As I remember, only one man sent him here; so, of course, he will have no trouble in doing that. [Laughter.]

I started to make this observation, and was diverted: If the Senators on the other side believe that the President's plan will solve the farm problem, they could have no occasion to object to the debenture plan, because the President and this "intelligent" board that he is to name alone could call it into existence. If your tariff paid to the farmer 50 per cent of what you say he is entitled to receive, then he asks nothing at the hands of this board under the debenture plan. If you believe that your promises to him are worth 50 cents on the dollar, if you believe half you say, then you have no objection to the debenture plan, because it can not be effective unless your plan falls short 50 per cent of what you say the farmer is entitled to receive.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I deem it the most important duty of a Member of the United States Senate or of a President to keep his pledges and his platform with the people of our country.

When the late campaign started I was invited to discuss with the farmers of the Northwest the plans of farm relief that might be granted to them under the new administration. I discussed two plans in the course of the campaign. The first of those plans was the Hoover plan.

The facts of that plan were presented to me by the campaign committee and by Mr. George Barr Baker, who served with Mr. Hoover in the Food Administration, and I made an accurate study of the Hoover plan. As I presented that plan to the farmers of the Northwest, and presented the record of Herbert Hoover, I pointed out to them how his organizations had fixed the prices of $10,000,000,000 worth of farm products. I pointed out to them how they had bought and sold farm products. I pointed out how he had asked and obtained a round billion dollars to handle wheat alone, buying and selling wheat. I also pointed out to them that the Hoover plan had also solved the farm problem during and after the war, that he had given to the farmers the best prices and the best prosperity they had ever had in all the history of agriculture.

Near the end of the campaign an attack was made upon Mr. Hoover by Senator Reed, of Missouri, in that able and furious method of his. I replied to that attack with the debenture plan, which he himself had proposed, and which I assisted him in rewriting and preparing as an amendment to the tax bill here in the Senate.

I described the debenture plan then as I do now, as the next best plan for the relief of the farm depression. The Hoover plan, which Mr. Hoover used in the Food Administration and in the Wheat Corporation, is the only plan that can, by legislation, solve this problem completely for the farmers of the United States. Next to that I said that the debenture plan was the best, and I pointed out its provisions as we presented it to the Senate of the United States, and called attention to the fact that it had received 23 votes in the Senate as an amendment to the tax bill.

Time went on, and the election was over, and when the election was over these gentlemen who wanted to talk to me about the farm problem during the campaign no longer wanted to see or talk to me about any farm problem. I suggested to the President elect himself a time or two conferences upon that subject, but the occasion never arose when he talked to me about the farm problem as had been done before.

Before the debate arose in the Senate I went before the Committee on Agriculture. I had the honor to be the first person appearing before that committee, and I presented to the committee the Hoover plan for the solution of the farm problem. I presented the plan that would fix the prices of the products at the cost of production, with 5 per cent capital return, very close to but less radical than the plan Mr. Hoover's organization had used during and after the war. I presented a plan that would authorize only a billion and a half dollars, to buy and to sell the agricultural surplus of the United States, which amounts to about $2,000,000,000 per year, and I showed that to be a moderate plan compared with the previous Hoover plans, because he had asked and received a billion dollars for his wheat corporation alone in 1919. When we include cotton and livestock and all the other farm products, we realize that a billion and a half is a small amount to handle the $2,000,000,000 of surplus. I presented all of that to the committee, and then I said to them that the next best relief was this debenture plan, that it would give some farm relief.

I have criticized the debenture plan because it goes only half way. It applies only one-half of the tariff, and the tariff representing the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, it ought to include all of the tariff, and not one-half of it.

That was the situation when the debate arose in the Senate of the United States. I took the floor in the Senate and spoke upon that proposition exactly as I did during the campaign, exactly as I did before the Committee on Agriculture. Then what started? We found an organization of snipers set up in the United States. There was Charles Francis Adams in the Cabinet itself, and he went over to Boston, a Democratic community in a Democratic State, and proceeded to denounce us who were speaking our sentiments upon this proposition.

Then along came a member of another cabinet, of the "medicine ball" cabinet, and that was William Hard, a noted writer. He said:

> The saddest sight in town is the estrangement between SMITH WILDMAN BROOKHART, of Iowa, and Herbert Hoover, of California. Senator BROOKHART, contemplating Herbert Hoover's rejection of the export-debenture plan for the relief of agriculture, feels that all his trust in Herbert Hoover as a progressive has been betrayed.
>
> For many months Senator BROOKHART has been telling his progressive and radical colleagues in the Senate and in the Corn and Wheat Belts that Herbert Hoover was the positive prince of progressives. He has been assuring all skeptics that Herbert Hoover concealed within his engineering exterior a progressive punch of superlative potency.
> In a word, Senator BROOKHART staked his whole reputation as a student of human nature upon Herbert Hoover's hidden appetite for progressivism as understood and as defined by the left wing of the Republican Party in the upper House of Congress.

Mr. President, I admit I had some feeling that there was a progressive principle in Herbert Hoover. His declaration of equality of opportunity for all men is all there is in the progressive movement. But along comes "Medicine Ball" Hard, now of that distinguished cabinet, and tells us that my idea was a "double-cross" and that we can not rely upon any progressive principles from the White House. If that be true, the time has come when the farmers of the United States would better get ready to elect a progressive President in the United States.

Last, and also least, there comes to the United States Senate, in this snipers' squad, HENRY J. ALLEN, of Kansas, the temporary Senator from that State, who is now a candidate for "ex-Senator," and who will win in that contest. He says:

> It is perfectly obvious that in the reference the Senator from Iowa seeks by use of a weasel word or two to present the idea that the President of the United States has changed his attitude—

And so forth.

I have presented the facts upon this question. I mean to continue to present these facts, in Kansas and in every other State. I do not intend to double cross the farmers who send me to the United States Senate.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. ALLEN. I will be very glad, indeed, to have the Senator come over to Kansas. He has been over there a good many times. He has never done us either harm or good, but we are always glad to have him come; and let him make no declaration of his intention to come through the misapprehension that it is going to cause anybody in Kansas any concern.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, the Senator will easily win his contest for "ex-Senator." [Laughter.]

Mr. President, this debenture matter will give some farm relief. It is not my method; it is not the Hoover method of farm relief which I presented to the farmers of the United States.

I do not know why this change of front has been made, but I do know it has been made without consulting me. I do know it has been made without anything being offered as a substitute for the original Hoover method of handling surpluses. Therefore I have supported the debenture, and shall vote against this conference report.

I say to the Senate of the United States that I am not going to abandon this farm fight. The Republican Party and the Democratic Party promised equality to agriculture in the United States, equality with other industries. There is only one time to quit that fight, and that is when the farmers get that equality. It is not given them in this bill. Without the debenture this is a bill to lend their cooperatives money, and loans is not what they need. They need better prices for their products so they can pay the excess loans they now owe.

Oh, yes; they are worse off in the United States. They are worse off because wheat is now down to $1.06¾, and Saturday was $1.07¾ in Chicago. I know they are worse off, because, according to the report of the Secretary of Agriculture, which I hold in my hand, in 1928 they sold 48,000,000 hogs and got about $200,000,000 less for those hogs than they got for 41,000,000 hogs in 1926.

The condition of the farmer is worse off because the United States Steel Corporation, upon its own report, which I hold in my hand, earned a net profit of one hundred and twenty-six million and odd dollars in 1928, a large part of which was paid by the farmers of the United States.

They are worse off because of the O'Fallon decision in the railroad rate case.

They are worse off because of the 20 per cent interest rate that has gone up on the stock exchange in New York, taking the surplus credit of the country away from agriculture.

They have not gained, they have lost, so far; and it looks to me now as if we will continue to lose until they defeat the "weasels" who put out platforms of promise and then come into Congress and neglect and forget those platforms.

Mr. President, Herbert Hoover said in his speech of acceptance that this farm problem was the greatest problem before the American people. I think, to carry out the solution of that problem, it should have had more of his attention than it has had. I think it has been neglected and turned over to machine politics.

So far as these newspapers are concerned, I have no more fear of them than the Senator from Kansas professes to have of me. I have always had 90 per cent of them against me, and that is one strong reason why the people supported me. They represent nothing, so far as the people are concerned——

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. They are the ones who fill their columns with "weasel" words all the time. They are the outfits that deceive the people. I expect them to be against any genuine plan of farm relief.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BROOKHART. I expect those newspapers to "double-cross" their constituencies. Some of them will take up this American problem from an American standpoint, in the interest of all the people. The rest of them are controlled. They are controlled, and they have deceived and attempted to deceive the farmers, but they are not deceiving them now.

I hold in my hand a letter from a farmer in Kansas. I will not read it, because its remarks about the Senator from Kansas would be a violation of the Senate rules. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, equality is all there is in Americanism. The Declaration of Independence was founded upon equality. All our history has been toward equality. Every amendment to the Constitution was to carve out the old inequalities which got into that instrument in the beginning. We will continue this farm fight. After this makeshift "weasel" bill has been enacted into law, if it ever shall be, we will continue this fight until agriculture has obtained that equality to which it is justly entitled.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, debate is closed and the question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. McKELLAR. On that question let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HEFLIN (when Mr. BLACK's name was called). I desire to announce that my colleague the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] is absent on account of illness. He has a general pair on this subject with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK]. If present, my colleague would vote "nay," and if present the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] would vote "yea."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE (when Mr. BLAINE's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE]. He is paired with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. GOULD], who is also unavoidably absent. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay." If the junior Senator from Maine were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (when the name of Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana was called). My colleague the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] is unavoidably absent from the city. He is paired with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS]. If present, my colleague would vote "yea," and the junior Senator from Mississippi would vote "nay."

Mr. HARRISON (when Mr. STEPHENS's name was called). My colleague the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS] is absent on account of sickness in his family. As stated by the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], my colleague is paired with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 43, nays 46, as follows:

NOT VOTING—6

Black	Gould	Robinson, Ind.	Stephens
Blaine	Kendrick

So the Senate refused to agree to the conference report.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist on its amendment and ask for a further conference with the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. McNARY, Mr. NORRIS, Mr. CAPPER, Mr. SMITH, and Mr. RANSDELL conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, not being able to get the floor before the vote, I desire to make a brief statement with respect to my vote on the conference report on farm relief. I am not among those who voted against the report because it does not contain the debenture plan of farm relief. I voted against the conference report, because to do otherwise would be to vote for a legislative measure that I do not believe in.

From the outset I have been opposed to the debenture plan, because, as is frankly stated by its sponsors, it is a bounty. This, all agree, to be a radical departure from the policy of our Government, but is justified by its advocates on the theory that it puts the farmer on a par with the manufacturer who is a beneficiary of the protective tariff system.

There is little danger, in view of the attitude of the House, of the debenture plan being enacted into law at the present time. My vote and the vote of a few others, however, may decide the fate of the House farm relief bill. My opposition to the House bill is such that I do not propose to aid in its enactment into law.

The provision for the creation of a Federal farm board in the so-called House bill sets up a bureau to which is given a working fund of $500,000,000 of public money. It creates machinery by which an elaborate scheme of price fixing and Government intervention in business may be set up. I am opposed to the Government being engaged in the business of agricultural production and marketing just as much as I am opposed to the Government directing any other industry or business. I am opposed to the agricultural interests of the country becoming a political football or being regulated by a political board.

That which is the trouble with the farm problem is not unlike the difficulties experienced by the textile and coal industries. For several economic reasons the textile industry, like the farming industry, is in a bad plight. Why not propose to equalize it with all other manufactures by stabilization associations till the "price is right"? Why not stabilize with Government aid the extensive unemployment in the country?

Overproduction, together with the waste between the farmer and the consumer due to the excessive freight rates and profits of the middleman, is one if not the chief difficulty of agriculture. Nothing is proposed in these measures to eradicate these.

The first way to solve the farm problem is the elimination of every penny of waste between farmer and consumer, whether it rises from speculation, hazard, or otherwise. I favor preferential freight rates for all food products—by such method the farmer and consumer would both benefit and no bounty extended that one group must pay to another group.

No governmental agency should engage in buying, selling, and price fixing of agricultural or any other products. Neither should any policy be adopted that would increase surplus production. The proposed farm relief measures indirectly do these things.

Why should the farmer become the sole solicitude of the Government by having a board created to nurse his ills and have a large revolving fund available, which, to my mind, is only the beginning of increased appropriations by the hundreds of millions of dollars from time to time? Does not this mean increased tax burdens, further centralization of Government, and no assurance of benefits to the farmer?

Tens of thousands of independent merchants throughout the country are in dire distress and likely to lose their businesses through the cutting of prices by chain stores. Why not organize one great chain of marketing agencies and put up a fund of $500,000,000 to stabilize these merchants against chain-store competition? Such a proposal no one would dare consider seriously.

Both of these proposals are an insidious march toward bureaucracy and socialism. As to the House bill, we hear it said that there is no price fixing and no bureaucracy, yet it proposes to loan several hundred millions of dollars to carry crops until they can be disposed of and at the same time create a farm board with a small army of employees with tremendous and undefined powers.

All this to me indicates a drift toward Government ownership. If our Government is to control prices and profits, individual ownership will in the future cease to exist. You can not separate, in my opinion, the control of initiative and the control of surpluses. If one is in the hands of the state, the other is bound to become such. It can not be denied that this is interference with the orderly production and marketing of agricultural products and that the end sought is increased prices for the consumer.

It is only a matter of time when such interference with the farmer will cause complexities which will become a burden to him as well as to the public at large.

Because I am opposed to the principle of subsidies, to the appointment of a dictator for farm relief, and to the Government loaning money as an experiment to bolster up any industry, I voted against both of these proposals. It is no benefit to the farmer to put him in a position where he must bow down and submit, and must, in order to carry on business, resort to cooperative marketing organizations, stabilization corporations, and a Federal farm board.

Further, it is admitted by the proponents of the House bill, including the President, that this is an experiment, yet it makes it a fixed policy of the Government for an indefinite period. There is no limit fixed for the experiment.

These measures propose the impossible. We can not, by law, without taxing the people for the benefit of a class, kill off the corn borer or the boll weevil, abolish the late frosts, wipe out overproduction, and give the public a bigger appetite. I regret that I find myself constrained to vote against both proposals as unsound and dangerous precedents.

Finally, about half the Members of this body believe with President Hoover that the debenture plan would bring disaster to America. The other half, who are all enthusiasts for farm relief, believe that the administration bill will give no relief to the farmer and even its supporters do not dare suggest more than to advocate it as an experiment.

Mr. President, let me sum up my opposition by quoting from an editorial of one of the leading farm journals of the country:

> If the Hoover farm relief program goes through, as appears inevitable, American agriculture will be handed one of the most colossal gold bricks in the history of the industry. This farm board places in Washington a supreme power that 10 years ago farmers would have repudiated en masse as bureaucratic and contrary to the spirit of American independence. The proposed legislation gives the board virtually unlimited powers to dictate the policies and management of farm cooperative organizations. Yet by the clever provision that stabilization corporations, which are to handle exportable surpluses, shall be owned and controlled by the farmers and operated to avoid losses, any failure of the whole scheme would be blamed to the farmers and their organization and not to the Federal board. However, any success would be credited to the administration plan. It is a clear case of "heads I win and tails you lose," with farmers holding the bag, as usual.

Bad as was the rejected equalization fee, and undesirable though the export debenture may be, they are but mere incidents compared with the fundamental principles in the Hoover farm-relief program that is likely to be enacted. It will get agriculture nowhere except into further trouble. Basicly two things are overlooked; first, that farmers themselves and not Washington bureaucrats must relieve American agriculture; and, secondly, that farmers are not looking so much for $500,000,000 additional indebtedness as they are to reduce present obligations.

Formerly the bulwark of American individual development and progressive independence, it now appears that farmers are to be herded onto the bureaucratic band wagon. The great agricultural industry is to be dictated to and ruled over by board and bureaus with another army of officeholders, clerks, and helpers which taxpayers can support. With the experience of the Federal Farm Loan Board and its doings so fresh in mind, it is strange that farmers can not foresee the outcome of a Federal farm board, with unlimited power and a personnel of which they have not a scintilla of voice in naming.

In this connection I ask to have printed in the RECORD a very able letter written to the Washington Post on April 24 last by former Senator Charles S. Thomas, of Colorado, in opposition to both the proposed farm relief measures.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

[From the Washington Post, April 24, 1929]

THE FARM RELIEF BILLS

By Charles S. Thomas, former Senator from Colorado

To the EDITOR OF THE POST:

SIR: In his letter to Senator MCNARY, the President has submitted 10 unanswerable objections to the so-called export debenture plan for subsidizing agriculture. Their truth is too obvious to require discussion or analysis. He might have easily outlined others equally indisputable; for example, that the plan involves the exercise of the taxing power for the sole benefit of a class pursuing a single industry; that it is class legislation of the most sinister and burdensome character, and a precedent for a brood of similar enactments for the stabilization of other pursuits confronted with depressed conditions. Apart from the intolerable additions to the national budget of expenditure, bureaucracy will geometrically progress with such legislation, whose certain collapse spells economic ruin.

But Mr. Hoover, whose intellectual processes, sharpened by rich and varied experiences extending for years over a vast field of observation, fit him for any task, certainly realizes that every criticism he has made of the export debentures plan is equally applicable to the agricultural bill just reported from the House committee; a bill to which Mr. Coolidge, if he were President, would apply the relentless logic of a veto message quite as vigorous as that with which he greeted its two predecessors of the Seventieth Congress.

The $500,000,000 carried by the House bill through which it is to function for the farming class is a subsidy differing only in amount from the debentures plan. It is designed for the same purpose. It is collected from the same taxpayers by a slightly different process. Its appropriation and expenditure "requires a substantial increase in taxes, so no such expenditure or depletion of revenues as this plan implies from the marginal income of the Government." It will stimulate production, bring profit only to speculators and farm bureaucrats. It will annually call for ever-increasing sums from the public Treasury to disappear in the quicksands of experiment. Paternalism will be too firmly in the saddle to be easily unseated after this costly but curious experiment of amateur economists enters the national blood currents and circulates for a while, yet we may be sure that natural laws will pursue their eternal course however much we may defy and deride them. In the near future we will have our experience, some one presumably will have enjoyed our money, and it is to be devoutly hoped that common sense will have resumed the direction of our Government.

But it is to be regretted that the administration very properly rejects a plan of class legislation running counter to both governmental powers and economic experience and sets the seal of its approval upon another which is equally obnoxious to them. Party pledges are excellent scapegoats sometimes. Generally the party which appeals to them in explanation of fundamental errors deliberately committed with full knowledge of their dire consequences, will not remain immune even when the opposing party is the worse offender. And no one knows better than Mr. Hoover that the legislative program of our politics—agricultural sciolism—is loaded with dynamite for him, for us, and for its expectant beneficiaries.

NATIONAL-ORIGINS CLAUSE OF IMMIGRATION ACT

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the resolution (S. Res. 37) to discharge the Committee on Immigration from the further consideration of the bill (S. 151) to repeal the national-origins provisions of the immigration act of 1924.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, if it is expected to have a vote on the national-origins question right away, I shall not interfere with it; otherwise I desire to present a conference report and ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I very much hope that we may have a vote on the national-origins question now.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. We on this side of the aisle are ready to vote.

Mr. HEFLIN and Mr. REED called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I object to any vote being taken at this time on the national-origins question. I intend to address the Senate on that subject before a vote is taken.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES IN CONGRESS—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I present the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 312) to provide for the fifteenth and subsequent decennial censuses and to provide for the apportionment of Representatives in Congress, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The report was read, as follows:

DECENNIAL CENSUS AND APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 312) to provide for the fifteenth and subsequent decennial censuses and to provide for apportionment of Representatives in Congress having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 6.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1, 2, 3, 5, 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert the following: "eight months from the beginning of the enumeration"; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 7: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out by the House amendment insert the following: ": Provided further, That in making any appointments under this act to positions in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, preference shall be given to persons discharged under honorable conditions from the military or naval forces of the United States who served in such forces during time of war and were disabled in the line of duty, to their widows, and to their wives if the husband is not qualified to hold such positions"; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 8: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert the following: "without regard to the civil service laws or the classification act of 1923, as amended, except that such special agents shall be appointed in accordance with the civil service laws"; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 9: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Omit the matter proposed to be stricken out and the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 10: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 10, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Omit the matter proposed to be stricken out by the House amendment and in lieu thereof insert the following: "to unemployment" and a comma; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 11: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert the following: "April"; and the House agree to the same.

W. L. JONES,
HIRAM W. JOHNSON,
A. H. VANDENBERG,
DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
MORRIS SHEPPARD,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

CARL R. CHINDBLOM,
E. HART FENN,
CLARENCE J. MCLEOD,
J. E. RANKIN,
RALPH F. LOZIER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not make a request for the present consideration of the report. I have no objection to its presentation, but I hope the Senator will not try to take it up to-day.

Mr. JONES. I did not anticipate that there would be any serious opposition to the conference report.

Mr. NORRIS. So far as I am concerned there may not be. I have not had an opportunity as yet to examine it. I should like to do so before it is taken up. It may be that there will be no opposition, but I can not tell the Senator now as to that.

Mr. JONES. I can state in about a minute what the situation is with reference to the two really disputed points.

Mr. NORRIS. I think I know concerning the disputed point in which I feel a particular interest what the conference report provides.

I should like to say to the Senator from Washington that I have no disposition, in the first place, to delay the consideration of the report. It may be that I shall not take up any time on it; I think I know what decision has been reached in regard to the particular point in which I am most interested; but I have had absolutely no time to consult with other Senators who feel as I do about it. I think the reason why I have not done so is perfectly apparent, so that I think I am not negligent in any way.

Mr. JONES. Not at all.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like not so much, perhaps, to examine it, although I want to do that, as to consult with several other Senators about the advisability of opposition to the report at the present time. I have not any idea, I repeat, whether there will be an opposition to it or not. So I should like, if the Senator will consent to do that, to have the report go over.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. KING. I have a resolution here which relates to the business of the Senate and ought to be acted upon before recess shall be taken. It relates to the witness, Cunningham, who was brought before the committee and refused to answer. It is a supplementary and necessary resolution and will take no time. I want to present it and have it acted upon.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I will yield in a few moments. I appreciate the attitude of the Senator from Nebraska, and I know that the Senator has not had an opportunity to study the report. I have no doubt there will be no unnecessary delay in regard to it. I am going to state the action of the conferees with reference to the two propositions which I think were really the controverted ones, and then I will let the conference report go over.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. JONES. I will yield in just a moment. With reference to the date of taking the census, there was a controversy, and the conferees have agreed that the taking of the census shall be begun on the 1st day of April, 1930. The House fixed the date as the 1st day of May, the Senate fixed it as the 1st day of November. The first conference agreed on the 1st day of November. The House rejected that conference report. So the conferees finally agreed upon April 1.

The other disputed proposition, I think, was with reference to census employees being selected under civil-service rules. We found the House really adamant in their opposition to the attitude of the Senate; but we finally persuaded the House conferees to agree to place the special agents under the civil service.

Now I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, the civil-service provision, to which the Senator has just referred, was the one in which I was particularly interested.

Mr. JONES. I realize that.

Mr. WAGNER. Unfortunately, I have an engagement to-morrow which will prevent my being here, and so I wonder if the Senator will consent to have the conference report considered on Thursday? That would involve only one day's delay. We shall be in session that long, anyway, and I may want to address the Senate on the compromise proposal.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I wish to state to the Senator that I have conferred with the leader on this side, and also with the Senator from Pennsylvania, and they both have agreed to protect me during my absence to-morrow occasioned by an engagement which I made about six months ago. Therefore, there may not be any business before the Senate if the national-origins question shall not be taken up to-morrow. I thought I ought to say that much to the Senator, in view of the fact that I also expect to be away to-morrow, and I am giving this information to the Senate for the purpose of having the Senator from Washington realize that there may be no business at all before the Senate to-morrow.

NATIONAL-ORIGINS CLAUSE OF IMMIGRATION ACT

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may we understand that we can have a vote on the immigration question on Thursday next?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. So far as I am concerned, I will very cheerfully agree to have a vote taken on Thursday, and I want to thank the Senator for accommodating me during my absence to-morrow.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] is temporarily out of the Chamber, having been called to answer a long-distance telephone message. I do not know whether he will object or not.

Mr. NYE entered the Chamber.

Mr. REED. I am not asking unanimous consent now for a vote at any particular time, but I should like to have it understood that we may have a vote on Thursday. I have been accused, I believe, of filibustering on this matter. My only desire was not to confuse the debate on the immigration question with that of the farm relief bill. Now, we have disposed of the conference report on the farm relief bill, and I should like very much to get a vote at the earliest possible date on the resolution as to the national-origins clause.

Mr. NYE. Does the Senator——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. NYE. Do I understand the Senator from Pennsylvania to say that he believes we can get a vote by Thursday on the immigration resolution?

Mr. REED. I hope we can.

Mr. NYE. Can we agree at this time to fix an hour for voting on Thursday?

Mr. REED. I should be willing to agree, Mr. President, that we have a vote at 3 o'clock on Thursday afternoon. I will make such a request in this form: That when the Senate concludes its business to-morrow it take a recess until noon on Thursday; that after the hour of 2 o'clock on that day debate shall be limited to 10 minutes on the part of each Senator; and that at the hour of 3 o'clock, without further debate, the Senate shall proceed to vote upon the unfinished business.

Mr. BLEASE. I object.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will the Senator not be willing to make it not later than 3 o'clock?

Mr. REED. I will say, then, "not later than 3 o'clock."

Mr. NYE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield further to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. NYE. The Senator from Pennsylvania makes the agreement dependent, then, upon the disposal of the conference report which is now before the Senate?

Mr. REED. Not at all.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to ask——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania not to modify his original request. Of course, the unfinished business is merely a resolution and is not subject to amendment or anything of that kind.

Mr. REED. I have not said anything about amendments.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that; but the Senator has changed his original suggestion so as to provide for a vote not later than 3 o'clock. I wish the Senator would omit those words and say "at 3 o'clock."

Mr. REED. I am perfectly willing to do that—to vote at 3 o'clock.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE and Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. JONES. I yield first to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I was merely going to suggest that if a definite hour is to be fixed for a vote, under the rule, the roll should be called before entering into the agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is not necessary in the case of a resolution of this kind. The rule applies to agreements for a final vote on bills and joint resolutions.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I merely wish to suggest that certainly the spirit of the rule in a matter which is as of great importance as this ought to be carried out.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senators are now practically all here.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the unanimous-consent proposal is agreeable to me. I should like to suggest, however, that those who may desire to speak upon the national-origins question shall be permitted to do so in preference to speeches upon other subjects. We had this afternoon the spectacle of several Senators trying to get the floor to explain their vote on the conference report and being unable to do so because three or four Senators occupied the entire time. I, therefore, think the suggestion of the Senator that the debate should be limited is a very excellent one; it has my approval, and I will consent to the proposed agreement if he will add to it the suggestion that Senators who may desire to speak upon the national-origins subject shall be given preference.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not believe it is necessary to make that suggestion a part of the unanimous-consent agreement. I think there is a general understanding that that course would be just, and I believe the Senate will observe such an understanding.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. As a matter of fact, objection has already been interposed. So why discuss the question?

Mr. REED. I have not heard any objection.

Mr. BLEASE. I have objected.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator from South Carolina objected.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, if we can have an understanding that we will dispose of the conference report on the apportionment and census bill on Thursday, I will have no objection to putting it over until that day, but unless we can have such an understanding, I think, perhaps, we had better proceed with the report. I am satisfied it will not take very long.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield to me to submit another request for unanimous consent?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. REED. I ask unanimous consent that further debate upon the national-origins resolution be limited to 10 minutes on the part of any Senator and that we proceed to vote upon it at 5 o'clock this afternoon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I object to that.

CENSUS AND APPORTIONMENT—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on Thursday we may dispose of the conference report which I have presented. That will not fix any definite time on Thursday, but I do not want the Senate to adjourn or recess on that day until the conference report shall have been disposed of. As I said a moment ago, I do not think it will take very long to act upon the conference report.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I have not examined the report, but am I correct in my understanding that it is a unanimous report?

Mr. JONES. It is.

Mr. ASHURST. I should like to ask the Senator what became of the amendment, which I believe was adopted in the Senate, which proposes that as to positions not within the classified or civil service direct preference shall be given to veterans of our various wars?

Mr. JONES. That is taken care of.

Mr. ASHURST. Then I am very heartily in favor of the adoption of the report.

Mr. BLEASE and Mr. WAGNER addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. JONES. I yield first to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I wish to make my position plain in connection with my objection to fixing a time for a vote. I agree thoroughly with what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has said, and I shall object in the future, if I am in the Senate, to any time being fixed by unanimous consent for a vote unless it be provided that the time allotted before the vote shall be devoted to a discussion of the subject upon which the Senate is to vote. If we should now agree to vote at 3 o'clock on Thursday, some Senator might get the floor, and, in violation of the spirit of the rule of the Senate, yield the floor for 5 or 10 minute speeches by other Senators. That would certainly be against the rules. However, one Senator may hold the floor and parcel it out to whom he pleases so that others who desire to express themselves may have no opportunity to express their views. I think the Senator from Massachusetts said that happened this afternoon.

I do not care to say very much on the national-origins question, but reference was made the other day to a Senator on this side who voted for the national-origins clause as being prejudiced against the German race. I propose to show by history that no South Carolinian who is an honest man can be prejudiced against the German people.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am willing to add to my request that after the hour of 1 o'clock on Thursday debate shall be limited to the subject of the unfinished business, and that the Chair shall be the judge of the relevancy of debate.

Mr. BRATTON. To that I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the conference report may be disposed of on the calendar day of Thursday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. WATSON. May I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. The Senate seems to be divided here as between the immigration question and the reapportionment measure. I hope that no kind of arrangement will be entered into that will compel an adjournment over to-morrow without the Senate doing anything. Whatever we undertake, we ought to discuss connectedly, and it seems to me it would be hodgepodge for us to take up both questions, immigration and census, and discuss them both to-morrow indiscriminately. I think the Senator from Washington ought now to insist on proceeding with the conference report immediately; then take it up again for discussion to-morrow, and if not completed then, vote on it on Thursday; but we can not very well have two questions pending and to be voted on the same day. In my judgment that would lead to confusion.

Mr. JONES. I want to say to the Senator that I am perfectly willing, of course, to go on to-day if I can do it; but the Senator heard the statement of the Senator from Nebraska, and I think it is a very reasonable one.

Mr. WATSON. But there is no reason why the Senator from Nebraska can not speak on the matter to-morrow.

Mr. JONES. He may not want to speak. He wants to look into the conference report and acquaint himself with it; that is all.

Mr. WATSON. I will ask the Senator from New York whether there is any reason why he can not proceed to-night to discuss the conference report?

Mr. WAGNER. I have no objection to going on to-night. The Senator from Nebraska asked for an opportunity to look at the conference report.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to suggest, while I can not give any assurance of the fact, that going on to-night may only prolong the debate. There may be no debate on the matter. The Senator from New York can not very well take it up to-morrow, because he has an important engagement; but I do not want to take it up to-night.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, if I may interject a remark, this is the first consideration I have asked of the Senate in my own behalf. This engagement was made some three months ago, and for that reason I am asking your indulgence until Thursday morning.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield further?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. That is entirely proper; but I was wondering if the Senator could not proceed now to the discussion of the bill.

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator from Nebraska suggests that there may be no further debate upon the subject.

Mr. WATSON. What I am trying to do is to arrange matters so that the Senate will have something to do to-morrow.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. In order that we may have something to do to-morrow, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock, and that thereupon the report of the Committee on Rules on the Jones resolution to amend the rules be laid before the Senate and taken up for consideration. We can consider that matter to-morrow.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. NYE. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Nebraska if he would insist upon his request providing there could now be an agreement for a vote upon the national-origins question?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; I would not stand in the way of that.

Mr. NYE. Will the Senator, then, withdraw his request to permit the presentation of another unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. NORRIS. All right; I withdraw it.

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota for that purpose.

NATIONAL-ORIGINS CLAUSE OF IMMIGRATION ACT

Mr. NYE. I ask unanimous consent that starting with the hour of 1 o'clock on Thursday debate shall be limited to 10 minutes, and that at 3 o'clock the Senate shall vote upon Senate Resolution 37.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Just a moment. When does the Senator propose to proceed to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. NYE. It is the unfinished business before the Senate; but I propose that, starting at 1 o'clock on Thursday, debate shall be limited to 10 minutes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have no objection.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I desire to know what status then remains for the conference report that has been presented by the Senator from Washington. I shall have to object to any arrangement that puts that conference report over until Friday, and then probably into the following week.

Mr. JONES. I was going to ask, then, if that agreement was made, that at 3 o'clock we proceed to the consideration of this conference report, and let it be disposed of on that calendar day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SWANSON. I object. It might take all day and all evening.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington has the floor. To whom does he yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. NYE. Has the unanimous-consent agreement been entered into?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not. There was objection.

Mr. NYE. Then I modify the request so as to provide for a final vote at 2.45 instead of 3 o'clock. I propose that modification because one Senator desires to leave at 3 o'clock.

Mr. REED. I shall object to that. I will agree to vote at 3 o'clock, but not at 2.45 unless the Senator will provide us with a pair for the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK]. We might as well be frank about this matter.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. GLENN. I withdraw my request for 15 minutes. I think I can catch the train in five minutes.

Mr. NYE. Then I withdraw my modification of the unanimous-consent agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I object, unless there can be related to it a satisfactory unanimous-consent agreement for voting on the conference report on the apportionment bill.

If the Senator will yield to me further, the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] seeks to speak only for 10 or 15 minutes. As I understand, he wishes to make a brief statement. It seems to me that he could make it this evening, and that the conference report could be determined to-morrow with almost no debate at all. The conferees of the Senate and of the House are absolutely unanimous, and there is no basis for further controversy.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. GLASS. If there is one thing above another that no Senator can predict, it is how long a Senator will speak. We were told here to-day, for example, that a Senator would occupy only 30 minutes. He occupied within 5 minutes of 2 hours; and others of us who wanted to engage in what some people appear to think is the difficult task of explaining our votes on the debenture were utterly denied the privilege of doing so.

I console myself with the reflection that a statement made after the vote was taken will make about as much impression upon the result as some of the speeches delivered to-day made upon the result. Therefore I desire an opportunity to explain my vote on the debenture. I would as soon do it to-morrow as to-day, or day after to-morrow as to-morrow; but I am not going upon the presumption that any Senator will want to speak only 10 minutes.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, what is the unanimous-consent proposal?

CENSUS AND APPORTIONMENT—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. JONES. I am perfectly willing to couple my request with the request of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE], that at the conclusion of the vote on Resolution No. 37 the conference report may be taken up and disposed of on that calendar day.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SWANSON. I should object to any agreement to vote on that calendar day. If that were done, we might stay here until midnight, and I am not willing to do it. The Senator is. He has charge of the bill; but I will not agree to it, and I shall object. Let us fix a specific time to vote.

Mr. JONES. I am perfectly willing to fix a specific time to vote.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. HEFLIN. I desire to suggest to the Senator that he request that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report immediately after the vote is had on the national-origins resolution. I do not think the conference report will take very long.

Mr. JONES. I do not think so, either.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. SWANSON. I am willing to vote at 6 o'clock or at 5 o'clock, but I am not willing to have such a unanimous-consent agreement that if the Senate wants to adjourn it can do so only after the bill is passed. If that were done, 94 Senators might be held here until 12 o'clock at night by one man.

Mr. JONES. Then I propose that we vote on the conference report not later than 5.30. That will give ample time. It will not take that much time.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. Let me suggest that immediately upon the disposal of the immigration question we proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the census bill.

Mr. JONES. That is what I proposed.

Mr. SMITH. The chairman states that it is a unanimous report, and apparently there will be very little objection to it. Why make it impossible to have a unanimous-consent agreement by fixing some definite time to vote on it? If we take it up, it is very possible that we will dispose of it before the day is over; and if we do not, we will dispose of it when those who want to discuss it are through.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WAGNER. I do not want to have any misunderstanding that this discussion on the question of the adoption of the conference report will be a perfunctory discussion. I have some very emphatic objections to the action of the conference committee on the civil-service amendment, and I should like an opportunity to discuss that question in the Senate.

Mr. SMITH. That is what we are trying to give the Senator.

Mr. WAGNER. Then the Senator proposes that on Thursday the matter be taken up?

Mr. JONES. That is what I propose. That is to accommodate the Senator from New York.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. DILL. The conference report has struck out the radio amendment. I desire to discuss that for a few minutes. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] was highly proper—that the agreement simply provide that the conference report be taken up immediately after the vote on this other matter and await developments. We will have all day Friday, if we do not get through on Thursday.

I suggest making that agreement.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. SWANSON. The unfinished business is the motion to discharge the Committee on Immigration from the consideration of the national origins bill. The Senator can get up this conference report only by moving to displace that as the unfinished business.

Mr. JONES. No; the taking up of a conference report is a privileged matter and would not interfere with the unfinished business.

Mr. SWANSON. But it will be necessary to make a motion to do it.

Mr. JONES. Yes; I understand that.

Mr. SWANSON. If the question of consideration is raised, it is in order at any time. It does not seem to me that the Senator can get an agreement to get that matter out of the way until the unfinished business is disposed of. My suggestion was that at 3 o'clock we take a vote on this motion to discharge the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. KING. On what day?

Mr. SWANSON. Thursday—and that this conference report then be made the unfinished business until disposed of.

Mr. JONES. If my colleagues on the conference committee are not satisfied——

Mr. WHEELER. I shall object, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana objects.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, what is the question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington has presented a conference report.

Mr. JONES. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the conference report, so that when it is presented a motion to take it up will be a privileged motion. Otherwise its consideration will not be privileged. I do not know whether or not that will be satisfactory to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to the Senator doing that. When the Senator presents it I know he will not take advantage of anyone's absence.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the conference report; and I will state then that I expect to present it——

Mr. ASHURST. I object to the withdrawal. It is a privileged matter now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair state that the conference report will lie on the table and be printed, which will give it the same status as if presented by the Senator later on?

Mr. JONES. Let me ask the Chair a question. Would a motion at any time on Thursday to take up the conference report and proceed to its consideration be a privileged motion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would so hold.

Mr. JONES. Then that is all right. I give notice that I shall move to take it up on Thursday.

NATIONAL-ORIGINS CLAUSE OF IMMIGRATION ACT

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Mexico will state it.

Mr. BRATTON. Was the unanimous-consent agreement proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] accepted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was not.

Mr. BRATTON. I did not understand that anyone objected to it as separated from the conference report on the census bill.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] objected.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, let me make one final effort to state an agreement.

I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-morrow it shall take a recess until Thursday noon; that after the hour of 1 o'clock on Thursday debate shall be relevant to the unfinished business, and shall be limited to 10 minutes on the part of each Senator.

Mr. WHEELER. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana objects.

THOMAS W. CUNNINGHAM—RECUSANT WITNESS

Mr. KING. Mr. President, from the Special Committee Investigating Expenditures in Senatorial Primary and General Elections I report a resolution which I send to the desk, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. It will take only a moment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 89), as follows:

Whereas the Special Committee Investigating Expenditures in Senatorial Primary and General Elections reported to the Senate on March 24, 1928, that a witness, Thomas W. Cunningham, declined to answer certain questions relative and pertinent to the matter then under inquiry, and the Senate agreed to a resolution (S. Res. 179) on March 24, 1928, directing the President of the Senate to issue his warrant commanding the Sergeant at Arms or his deputy to take into custody the body of said Thomas W. Cunningham wherever found, and to bring the said Thomas W. Cunningham before the bar of the Senate, "then and there or elsewhere as it may direct, to answer such questions pertinent to the matter under inquiry as the Senate, through its said committee, or the Persident of the Senate, may propound, and to keep the said Thomas W. Cunningham in custody to await further order of the Senate"; and

Whereas the President of the Senate did issue his warrant commanding the Sergeant at Arms or his deputy to take into custody the body of the said Thomas W. Cunningham, and pursuant to such warrant said Thomas W. Cunningham was taken into custody by the Deputy Sergeant at Arms; and

Whereas the said Thomas W. Cunningham sued out a writ of habeas corpus in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania and the said court entered an order discharging the writ and remanding the said Cunningham to the custody of the Sergeant at Arms; and

Whereas an appeal was taken from the order of the said district court to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit and the said circuit court of appeals reversed the district court; and

Whereas on writ of certiorari to the Supreme Court of the United States, that court, on May 27, 1929, reversed the judgment of the said circuit court of appeals; and

Whereas pursuant to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States a mandate will be issued in due course and following the usual procedure to the said district court, and the necessary steps will be taken to provide for the delivery of the said Cunningham into the custody of the Sergeant at Arms or his deputy; and

Whereas the Senate may not be in session when the said Cunningham is taken into custody by the said Sergeant at Arms or his deputy: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate is hereby authorized, after Thomas W. Cunningham is taken into custody, to release him from custody upon the furnishing by the said Cunningham of a good and sufficient bond in the sum of $1,000, to be approved by the Secretary of the Senate, conditioned upon the appearance of the said Cunningham at the bar of the Senate at such time or times as the Senate may require.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Utah if the questions which Mr. Cunningham refused to answer related to the general election or to the primary?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The questions related to the primary.

Mr. BLEASE. Then, I object to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not object.

Mr. BLEASE. I do not believe in the United States Senate having anything to do with a party primary, and I object.

Mr. REED. I do not think the Senator heard the resolution.

Mr. BLEASE. Yes; I heard it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, as much as I want to see the resolution taken up, I fear that motion would necessitate laying aside the unfinished business.

Mr. KING. I think we can dispose of it in a few moments.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Is not the resolution of a privileged character?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Would the consideration of the resolution affect the status of the unfinished business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It would not.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Then, I hope the Senator from Utah will make his motion.

Mr. KING. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator yield for a question before we take it up?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Can the Senator give us any idea as to how soon the mandate of the court is likely to be handed down? This action may be unnecessary. The Senate may be in session.

Mr. KING. I am advised it will be several weeks before the mandate will go down and the necessary order entered.

Mr. NORRIS. The idea occurred to me that if we should not take a recess this resolution would be unnecessary. I have no objection to it.

Mr. KING. Of course, if we should be in session, then the resolution would not go into effect, and the Sergeant at Arms would bring Mr. Cunningham to the bar of the Senate; but this is anticipating that possibly there will be a recess. It seems to me it is a very wise precaution to be taken, because the Sergeant at Arms would not desire to hold Mr. Cunningham in custody for an indefinite period, or until the Senate returned.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Utah that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, there is no rule requiring a Senator to speak on this resolution for an hour?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is not.

NATIONAL-ORIGINS CLAUSE OF IMMIGRATION ACT

Mr. BLEASE. I want to answer in part the argument made on the floor of the Senate a few days ago when one Senator stated that a vote in favor of the national-origins clause was a vote showing prejudice against the German race.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me to move an executive session?

Mr. BLEASE. I yield.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. WATSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened; and the Senate (at 5 o'clock p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, June 12, 1929, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, June 11, 1929

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Rev. Newton P. Patterson, D. D., pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, we approach Thee with great humility and a contrite spirit. We humbly recognize Thee as our sovereign Lord.

We thank Thee for the abundant blessings of Thy gracious favor bestowed upon us and upon all the people of our land. We thank Thee for all the material and spiritual blessings of life.

We most heartily beseech Thee to look with favor upon us as we are assembled in Thy presence. Wilt Thou imbue us with the spirit of wisdom, goodness, and truth? Wilt Thou so rule our hearts that law and order, justice and peace, may everywhere prevail? Make us strong and great in true fear of the Almighty and in the love of righteousness, so that being blessed of Thee we may become a blessing to all nations.

Bless the President of these United States, all who are in official capacity, and all citizens of our land, that that true rightecusness which exalteth a nation may be our chief effort and our crown of glory, to the praise and the honor of Thy holy name. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Speaker, I present Representative-elect C. MURRAY TURPIN, of the twelfth district of Pennsylvania.

C. MURRAY TURPIN, Representative elect from the twelfth district of Pennsylvania, appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office prescribed by law.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE SPEAKER

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following appointments:

As directors for the Columbia Institution for the Deaf, Mr. SMITH, of Idaho, and Mr. BLOOM, of New York.

Members of the board of directors for the Columbia Hospital for Women, Mrs. ROGERS, of Massachusetts, and Mrs. NORTON, of New Jersey.

PROHIBITION ENFORCEMENT

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in connection with the shooting of Henry Wirkkula by Federal agents at International Falls a few days ago.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, the Associated Press yesterday and to-day has furnished the newspapers with accounts of the killing of Henry Wirkkula by Federal enforcement officers assigned to liquor-smuggling duty. The killing took place on June 9, and in the eighth congressional district which I represent in Congress. According to newspaper reports the man was driving an automobile on a public highway in the nighttime. His wife and two small children were riding with him. A command to "halt" was given, and he was in the act of stopping his automobile when he was shot and killed. A sawed-off shotgun in the hands of an officer of the United States was the weapon used to bring about death. The wife and children narrowly escaped the same fate. No liquor was found in the automobile and the driver was on a peaceful mission at the time of the shooting. If investigation proves that this is the correct story of the shooting, then I want to protest in the name of the people of my district against this violation of law and constitutional government. The courts and a jury will determine the responsibility of the party who did the shooting. The merit, or lack of merit, of prohibition will have nothing to do with that question.

This is one of a series of shootings that have taken place, apparently as a part of an attempted program of law enforcement of the eighteenth amendment. The misguided Federal officer who did the shooting is but an incident in the problem. It is time to inquire if superior officers and men in charge of this work have established and are putting into effect a program where subordinates are authorized to kill upon suspicion. If they deny such a program, then it is high time to find out if private individuals or organizations of individuals put the stamp of approval upon such methods as those which led to the tragedy in question.

I do not favor the killing of a human being as a part of a program of law enforcement. To advocate such a principle is just as bad as to advocate mob law. We do not want a return to barbarian days, when people charged with crime were first killed and their guilt determined afterwards.

Neither can the killing be justified by any principle of law or constitutional government. Every lawyer knows that the right to arrest does not carry with it the authority to kill. There is not a line in the Constitution of the United States that will lend favor to the killing of this man under the facts set forth in the accounts of his death. In fact, the law was violated and the Constitution nullified by what took place.

President Hoover has just recently appointed a Crime Commission. Its duties and objects are well known. I want to wholeheartedly suggest that it can make no better beginning than to investigate the killing of Henry Wirkkula.

I have asked William D. Mitchell, the Attorney General of the United States, and Seymour Lowman, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, for an investigation and report concerning this killing. I am also asking local authorities for the facts. I have already received from Hugh Reidy, sheriff of Koochiching County, International Falls, Minn., a partial report. Mr. Reidy is a disinterested public official and telegraphed me as follows:

This man Henry Wirkkula was going to his home at Big Falls from International Falls, accompanied by his wife and two small daughters. About 27 miles south of International Falls, on No. 4 Highway, he was flagged by two customs men, one by the name of Emmit White and the other by the name of Emil Servine. He ran by their sign, and White opened fire on him, killing him instantly and ditching the car. Used sawed-off shotgun. We found 26 buckshot holes in back of car. All holes were high on back of the car, and I and the head of the customs searched the car and found no liquor.

The report of Sheriff Reidy indicates a situation that calls for protest. What about the widow and orphan children of this man? When the investigation is completed I intend to say more to this House respecting our duty to them. Just now I want to say that I take it we are all in favor of law enforcement. But if the killing of innocent men is a part of that program then we had better change the program. If prohibition can only be enforced by the use of sawed-off shotguns in the hands of irresponsible Government agents, then, indeed, have we reached the high tide of fanaticism and bigotry in this matter. We have reached a point where respectable citizens have not only the right but the duty to replace prohibition with some method of Government control under which law and order will prevail.

CENSUS—APPORTIONMENT

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill S. 312, the census and apportionment bill, and ask unanimous consent that the report alone may be read.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? May I have five minutes on this conference report?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I see no objection to that. Of course, the conference report is privileged and the time of debate is one hour, in control of myself. I see no objection to the gentleman having five minutes, but I do not think it ought to be made a matter of record.

Mr. HASTINGS. I know the report is privileged, and I am simply asking that I may have this time before the matter is foreclosed.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I see no objection to that.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield me one-half of the time?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If we need any debate. I was hopeful we would not need much debate.

Mr. RANKIN. I do not know that we will, but one or two gentlemen have asked for time.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I will, of course, be courteous to the gentleman and yield whatever time would seem to be necessary.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois calls up the conference report on the bill S. 312, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the conference report.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 312) to provide for the fifteenth and subsequent decennial censuses and to provide for apportionment of Representatives in Congress submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

On amendment No. 1: The Senate bill provided for a census of radio sets. The House amendment struck out this provision; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 2: The Senate bill provided for the taking of the census in the year 1929 and every 10 years thereafter. The House amendment changed 1929 to 1930; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 3: The Senate bill provided for the beginning of the 3-year decennial census period on the 1st of July next preceding the census provided for in section 1. The House amendment changed this date to the 1st day of January, 1930, and every tenth year thereafter; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 4: The Senate bill provided that the tabulation of population should be completed within 12 months. The House amendment changed this to six months from the beginning of the enumeration. The Senate recedes with an amendment requiring the completion within eight months from the beginning of the enumeration.

On amendment No. 5: The Senate bill provided for appointment by the Director of the Census of temporary employees in the District of Columbia for the taking of the census, with compensation not to exceed the compensation received by other civil-service employees engaged in like or comparable service. The House amendment struck out this limitation on the compensation; and the Senate recedes.

On amendments Nos. 6, 7, and 8: The Senate bill provided (by the language proposed to be stricken out by amendment No. 6) that, in the case of appointments in the executive branch of the Government in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, preference should be given to honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, marines, and their widows, and to wives of injured soldiers, sailors, and marines if the husband was not qualified to hold the position. The Senate bill further provided (by the language proposed to be stricken out by amendment No. 7) that in making all appointments necessary to the taking of the census preference should be given to American citizens and ex-service men and women. The Senate bill further provided (by the language proposed to be stricken out by amendment No. 8) that in appointments to the field service for taking the census appointments should be made subject to the civil service laws and that direct preference should be given to disabled veterans of wars in which the United States has been engaged.

The House, by amendments Nos. 6 and 7, proposes to strike out the first two of these provisions, and by amendment No. 8 proposes to strike out the third provision and to insert in lieu thereof the requirement that appointments in the field service should be made without reference to the civil service, but that preference should be given to disabled veterans of wars in which the United States has been engaged, and wives of disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines if the husband is not qualified for appointment.

The House recedes on amendment No. 6, which merely restates existing law, and the Senate recedes on amendments Nos. 7 and 8 with amendments providing—

(1) That in making any appointments under this act to positions in the District of Columbia or elsewhere first preference shall be given to honorably discharged United States veterans disabled in the line of duty during any war, to their widows, and to their wives if the husbands are not qualified for appointment; and

(2) That appointments to the field service under the act shall be without reference to civil service laws, except that the special agents shall be appointed under the civil service laws.

On amendment No. 9: The Senate bill provided that employees of the departments and independent offices of the Government may be employed and compensated for field work in connection with the Fifteenth Census, but that when so employed shall not be paid in the aggregate a greater compensation than they would receive for service in the positions held by them. The House amendment strikes out this limitation and inserts a provision that when so employed they shall not be subject to the provisions of section 1765 of the Revised Statutes or section 6 of the act of May 10, 1916, as amended by the act of August 29, 1916, which prohibit a person holding one position from receiving pay beyond a prescribed limit under another appointment or pay in addition to regular compensation unless authorized by law. The Senate recedes with an amendment omitting the limitation of the Senate bill and also the matter inserted by the House amendment, the later being omitted as surplusage, since the Senate bill already provides that these employees (as well as officers and enlisted men engaged in enumerations at military posts) may be "employed and compensated" for census work.

On amendment No. 10: The Senate bill provided that the fifteenth and subsequent censuses should be restricted to population, agriculture, irrigation, drainage, distribution, unemployment, radio sets, and mines. The House amendment struck out of this list unemployment and radio sets. The Senate recedes with an amendment restoring the word "unemployment" to the list.

On amendment No. 11: The Senate bill provided that the census of population and agriculture should be taken as of the 1st day of November. The House amendment changed this to the 1st day of May; and the Senate recedes with an amendment making the date the 1st of April.

On amendment No. 12: The Senate bill provided a fine of not exceeding $1,000 for persons offering or rendering any information or suggestion to any census employee engaged in enumeration of population with unlawful intent to cause an inaccurate enumeration. The House amendment provided, as an alternative penalty, imprisonment for not exceeding one year, or both; and the Senate recedes.

On amendments Nos. 13 and 14: The Senate bill provided for the taking of a census of agriculture and livestock in 1934 and every 10 years thereafter, the census to be taken as of the 1st day of November. The House amendment changed the beginning year to 1935 and the month to January; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 15: This is a clerical amendment; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 16: Section 22 of the Senate bill provided for the method of reapportioning the House under the fifteenth and subsequent decennial censuses. The House amendment strikes out the entire section and inserts a new section covering the same matter. The only differences (other than clerical amendments) are as follows:

(1) The Senate bill provided that the statement to be transmitted by the President to the Congress should contain an apportionment of the "existing number" of Representatives made by apportioning such number among the States according to their numbers as ascertained under the census "by the method used in the last preceding apportionment and also by the method of equal proportions." The corresponding portion of the House amendment provides that the statement should contain the number of Representatives to which each State would be entitled under an apportionment of the "then existing number" of Representatives made in each of the following manners: By the method used in the last preceding apportionment, by the method known as the method of major fractions, and by the method known as the method of equal proportions.

(2) The Senate bill provided that if the Congress to which the President's statement is transmitted fails to pass a reapportionment law, then each State shall be entitled to the number of Representatives shown in the statement, based on the method used in the last apportionment, until an apportionment law is enacted or a subsequent statement is submitted. The corresponding provision of the House amendment provides that the apportionment shall remain in effect until the taking effect of a reapportionment under this act or subsequent statute.

The Senate recedes on this amendment.

CARL R. CHINDBLOM,
E. HART FENN,
CLARENCE J. MCLEOD,
J. E. RANKIN,
RALPH F. LOZIER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, this conference report conforms to the report which was submitted yesterday, in all particulars except two, and of course they are very important and vital to the legislation.

In the first place, the date for the taking of the census was changed from November, 1929, and every tenth year thereafter as proposed yesterday, to April, 1930, and every tenth year thereafter.

In the second place, the conference report submitted yesterday exempted all of the positions in the field service for the taking of the census, including the supervisors, assistant supervisors, enumerators, interpreters, and special agents, from the provisions of the civil service laws. This report conforms to that general plan, but does place special agents subject to appointment under the civil service laws.

When the conferees met yesterday afternoon the legislative situation in the Senate had become such that there was very great anxiety on the part of those interested in the legislation that if possible it might come up for action in the House to-day and possibly in the Senate.

The Senate is to vote to-day at 4 o'clock on the conference report on the farm bill, as doubtless the Members of the House know, and if we act expeditiously in the House upon this conference report, it is hoped that the report may be presented to the Senate, and probably acted upon either before or after the action on the farm bill in the Senate to-day.

Personally, I therefore hope that there will not be any necessity for any prolonged discussion of the conference report. I shall be very pleased to answer questions, and, of course, I shall yield to those who have a right to expect time to debate such time as they may consider absolutely necessary.

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. Did the conferees give consideration to the fact that the month of April is usually the very worst month in the year, in so far as roads are concerned? [Laughter.]

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BURTNESS. This is a serious question to me.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Of course, I will treat it seriously. I know it is a serious question. I will say to the gentleman that since it was the evident determination of the House that the date of November should be eliminated and a date as near May 1 as possible should be accepted, we again conferred with the Director of the Bureau of the Census, and even with the Secretary of the Department of the Interior, and we were advised by the Director of the Bureau of the Census that by employing men for overtime and perhaps engaging some additional employees it would be possible, under those conditions, beginning on the 1st of April, to have the enumeration of the population finished by the last of November.

Mr. BURTNESS. Does the gentleman think the Director of the Census had in mind the condition of the roads in the Northern States in April?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I have not understood that the month of April would be entirely impossible for such work as the enumeration of the census.

Mr. BURTNESS. I refer to those sections where they do not have paved roads.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I want to say in that connection that, as the House will observe, we agreed to a change in amendment No. 4, in which the time for taking the enumeration of population is to be finished in eight months from the beginning of the enumeration. I will say, also, that although the census generally will be started on the 1st of April, it has been the experience of the bureau that that work has never been done promptly in all places within the United States. If it were so done, this length of time might not be necessary. There must be some leeway, some latitude given, and doubtless it would be given, by the director in places where it was impossible to take enumeration.

In the case of the census of 1920 where it was to be taken on the 1st day of January, the enumeration was not completed and proclamation made until October. It took 10 months before the director made the specific proclamation of the enumeration in 1920. Here we have given him eight months. We think he will be able to do the work in eight months. Personally, I feel grateful to the conferees on the part of the Senate for the attitude they displayed yesterday in consenting to this arrangement which is in the nature of a compromise.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the census is commenced in April, 1930, it is clear that it will be impossible to have a reapportionment before the 1930 congressional elections. Am I right in that?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The old arrangement provided that after the enumeration the President should submit to Congress within a week after the assembling of Congress in the short session of the Seventy-first Congress the results of the enumeration.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That would give time to make the reapportionment?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Not before the elections of 1930. The elections of 1930 will be over before the first week in December, 1930.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then we will have no new apportionment of the House until the Seventy-third Congress.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes; that has always been the plan.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. One more question.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman yields on that, does he?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; I yield. What are the duties of the special agents?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The special agents are representatives of the Bureau of the Census who will go out into the various supervisor and enumerator districts, wherever there is a necessity for special work to be done and where there may be some difficulties that have to be mopped up and expedited.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. How many of them will there be?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Between 500 and 1,000.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And these bright boys are to be selected by the Civil Service Commission; and if they are, God help the census. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Our report yesterday contemplated the elimination of all of these field employees from the civil service, but, of course, I hope the House understands that in case of a bill like this, which originated in the Senate—which might have originated in the House and in all probability would have done so, especially with reference to the apportionment feature—that especially in case of a bill that originated in the Senate the House can not presume to get everything it wants in the way of amendments; there must be some yielding on both sides.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We will take the census of the unemployed, will we not?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The item of unemployment remains as one of the subjects of enumeration.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Some of us may be in that crowd at that time.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, in order that the whole situation in regard to the application of the civil service laws may appear, I wish to call attention to the fact that all temporary appointments of employees in the District of Columbia for the census work must be made in conformity with the civil service laws and rules, at rates of compensation to be fixed by the Director of the Census. This provision was contained in the Senate bill and was not changed by the House or, of course, by the conferees. It will be found in section 3 of the bill.

Mr. Speaker, if there is nothing further, I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. RANKIN. Thirty minutes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. We did not expect that it would be necessary to take up the whole of the time in the consideration of this conference report.

Mr. RANKIN. I just want the gentleman to yield me half the time, because I want to yield to some others. If we do not use it all, we will yield back the time.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. We followed that course yesterday, but that is not the usual course in the consideration of conference reports. I am glad to yield such time as the gentleman wants.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman agree to yield to some other gentleman in the House?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Certainly.

Mr. RANKIN. Then start me off with 10 minutes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I want to give the Members of the House some information about this proposed taking of the census. We agreed finally to accept the conference report if they would give us the date of April 1 for the beginning of the taking of the census. In some of the Northern States there is bad weather at that time, and this provision is written into the bill to take care of that situation. I desire the attention of the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURTNESS] and the attention of other gentlemen from the extreme Northern States, as well as the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL]. Section 6 provides:

> SEC. 6. That the census of the population and of agriculture required by section 1 of this act shall be taken as of the 1st day of April, and it shall be the duty of each enumerator to commence the enumeration of his district on the day following unless the Director of the Census, in his discretion, shall change the date of commencement of the enumeration in said district by reason of climatic or other conditions which would materially interfere with the proper conduct of the work.

I took this up personally with the Director of the Census this morning, and he promised me—and I told him that I was going to quote him on the floor of the House—that in those States where the weather is bad, such States as North Dakota, Maine, Vermont, New York, Michigan—and I ask the gentleman from Michigan just to think what they are getting out of this bill——

Mr. WOODRUFF. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken. We have no bad weather in Michigan.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman evidently lives near the city of Detroit. [Laughter.]

The Director of the Census promised me that he would defer the beginning of the taking of the census in those localities until suitable weather conditions prevailed. In that way we will have plenty of time to take the census. In the States where bad weather prevails in April the taking of the census will be deferred until May or June, or until you have suitable weather. That is what we want. We want a full and accurate census of all the people in the United States, where they are supposed to live, and for that reason we have been fighting to get a census taken at a time when the most of the people would be at home.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The gentleman has read the paragraph that gives the Director of the Census discretion to change the date. I take it for granted that there is no understanding that he could change the date so as to select an earlier date.

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, no.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. It was thoroughly understood that the change of date was to be after the 1st of April, if he should make a change.

Mr. RANKIN. How could he take the census as of the 1st of April if he should take it before the 1st of April? That would be impossible. It is impossible for him to go behind that date, but in those States where the weather conditions are bad at that time he has the right to defer the taking of the census until suitable weather prevails.

Mr. ELLIS. The word is "defer," so as to make it later.

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I hope it will turn out that there is no April fooling about this census. If there is any, we will blame the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, no; the April fooling took place among some of the old guard yesterday when they undertook to run this November 1 date over us and the House revolted. [Laughter.]

We are not trying to fool anybody. We are simply working for what we deem to be the best interests of all the people of the country. We have done the best we could. As far as I am concerned, I am against the whole bill. It has some provisions in it that I do not want; but you have passed the bill, and the only things left for the conferees to consider were those questions on which the two Houses had disagreed, and we took them up and ironed them out as best we could and gained for the agricultural States one of the things for which we have been contending for the last eight years. I shall be glad now to answer any questions that any of you may ask.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. GIBSON. For a brief statement?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I quite agree with the statement of the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURTNESS] that April is a very bad month for the enumeration. I think some gentlemen do not understand the conditions of dirt roads when the frost is coming out of the ground. Let me give you an illustration. I live in the southern part of my State. Our county court convenes on the second Tuesday of April, which was the 9th day of April of this year. The county seat is 13 miles away from my home town. The court had to be put over for two weeks because it was impossible to get over the 13 miles of road from my home town, where most of the lawyers live, to the county seat.

Mr. BOWMAN. And where was this?

Mr. GIBSON. This was in Vermont, the best State in the Union, I will say to the gentleman from West Virginia. I took this matter of our situation up with the Director of the Census this morning, and he assured me that in Vermont, New Hampshire, Maine, and any other State, where the road conditions were such that it was not possible to get around and not practical to commence the work in April, the actual enumeration would be deferred until such time as the census could be reasonably taken in order to insure an honest and accurate count. The bill permits the director in his discretion to change the date of commencement of the enumeration in any district by reason of climatic or other conditions which would materially interfere with the proper conduct of the work. My understanding is that this discretion will be exercised to the end that a full and correct enumeration will result.

Mr. RANKIN. I thank the gentleman from Vermont for that statement, and I yield back the remainder of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I hope this conference report will be approved. It is a unanimous report and represents the best that can be done now with the census and reapportionment bill. You will deserve that the House is having its way in fixing the date on which the enumeration is to begin. The Senate is yielding to the House on this important question as to the time; that is, the year and the month when the census is to be taken. We have won a big victory in having the census taken in 1930 instead of 1929, and also in having the census taken in the spring of the year instead of in the winter. This, from the standpoint of agriculture, is the one big, outstanding, and all-important question.

I represent a great agricultural constituency, and I come from one of the greatest agricultural States in the Union. Missouri is the heart and the keystone of the agricultural Mid West. In trying to speak for the agricultural classes I have regarded it as of paramount importance to have the census taken in the spring of the year, when the farm population is on the farm, so we may secure an accurate count of the agricultural population.

While I preferred May as the best month in which to take the census, April is about as satisfactory, and either of these dates is preferable to November. The taking of the census can begin April 1, and if the weather conditions should be adverse the enumeration can run over into May. As a concession to the Senate conferees, and in order to add one month to the time between the taking of the census and the report of the Census Bureau to Congress, we have agreed on April 1, 1930, as the date on which the census enumeration will begin, unless postponed by the Director of the Census because of weather conditions.

Now, a census taken in April or May will, in my opinion, show several million more farm population than a census taken in November, and this will mean 15 or 20 more Congressmen, and 15 or 20 more votes in the Electoral College for the agricultural States. This is a prize worth fighting for, and an agreement on the April 1 date is a distinct victory for the agricultural States.

From the beginning I have appreciated the importance to the agricultural sections of having this census taken in the spring of the year, and I have made a determined fight to prevent agriculture from being ravished in the approaching census and apportionment of the membership of the House. I have vigorously opposed the plan to have the census taken in the winter months when many farm hands, farmers, and members of their families are not on the farm, but are in the cities working temporarily in great industrial plants, or engaged in other work in other States during the winter months, which is the dull season on the farm.

Those of us who have been trying to secure for agriculture a fair census, have had to combat the combined opposition of the leaders in the House and Senate, and we have been compelled to fight the Representatives who come from the great cities and from the industrial States, who want the census taken in the winter when millions of farm boys and men are temporarily in the cities where they would be counted, thereby swelling the city population and reducing the population of the agricultural communities.

Those of us who have been fighting for a square deal for agriculture have a won a worth-while victory over tremendous odds and over a militant and well-organized opposition. The Members of Congress from the agricultural States, both Democrats and Republicans, have realized the importance of this struggle over dates, and have stood together, making common cause, and as a result we are writing into this bill a provision that requires the census population to be taken in the spring of the year when there is a larger number of people on the farm than in any other season. This means that the census will show a larger farm population than would be shown if the census were taken in November. This will give the agricultural States a larger membership in the House and a larger vote in the Electoral College than they would have if the enumeration is taken in November.

There is another distinct advantage in having the agricultural population accurately enumerated. In many States the membership in the State legislature will be affected by the population census. After the 1930 census is taken, in many States the State legislative and State senatorial districts will be changed and the States redistricted according to the 1930 census. If a considerable part of the farm population is working in the cities when the census is taken, then the rural counties will have a reduced population in the State legislatures, while the cities will have a correspondingly large representation in your State legislatures.

So I repeat, it is of very great importance to have an accurate enumeration of the farm population in the coming census. The future welfare, power, and influence of agriculture depend on agriculture getting a square deal and an accurate enumeration in the approaching census.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LOZIER. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. SLOAN. I want to congratulate the gentleman and the other conferees on the distinct victory they have achieved in changing this date. You will notice that the change is less than 10 months and more than 9 months; and, following the injunction of the Scripture to multiply, our young men will marry and multiply and replenish the earth and win next year in the census what we have failed to win for lack of numbers here.

Mr. LOZIER. I thank the gentleman for his pertinent observations, and for his contribution to a proper understanding of the importance to agriculture of having this census taken at a time when the farm population will be at home and can be accurately enumerated.

I am not going to take any more time of the House, except to say that this date is fair to the agricultural population and not unfair to the industrial population. It is fair to the country and not unfair to the cities. It is the best date for all the people of all the States. As the report is unanimous and well considered I trust it will be approved by the House.

I yield back the remainder of my time. [Applause and cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, the apportionment bill as it passed the Senate provided that the appointments made in the taking of the census should be under the civil service. That would have insured an intelligent, nonpartisan, and absolutely fair census being taken. That is what the country wants. In lieu of the civil-service provision we have the camouflage provision inserted, as follows:

Provided further, That in making any appointments under this act to positions in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, preference shall be given to persons discharged under honorable conditions from the military or naval forces of the United States who served in such forces during time of war and were disabled in the line of duty, to their widows, and to their wives if the husband is not qualified to hold such positions.

Of course, this provision is only meant to deceive. It would indicate that some preference was to be given ex-service men or their widows or wives. A similar provision is inserted in other laws and regulations of the Post Office Department. This provision is inserted to draw the attention away from civil-service promises. It is for nothing else. You are not deceiving anyone. Everyone knows that you can get competent enumerators to take the census in every district throughout the Nation, through the civil service, and everyone knows you have plenty of time to arrange for the examinations and make the selections long prior to April 1, 1930, when the actual enumeration begins, but you do not want to do this and you want to get around the civil-service promises that are made in your platforms, and in order to do this you camouflage it in the name of the ex-service men. Oh, how many political crimes are committed in their name.

The Republican platform in 1928 contains the following provision concerning the civil service:

The merit system in Government service originated with and has been developed by the Republican Party. The great majority of our public-service employees are now secured through and maintained in the Government under civil-service rules. Steps have already been taken by the Republican Congress to make the service more attractive as to wages and retirement privileges, and we commend what has been done as a step in the right direction.

The Democratic platform contained the following:

Grover Cleveland made the extension of the merit system a tenet of our political faith. We shall preserve and maintain the civil service.

Now, to avoid criticism and to draw the attention of the country away from a violation of these pledges the above is inserted in the pending census bill to give the ex-service men and their widows and wives preference. It is a politically adroit way of nullifying the civil-service promises. What will be done, of course, is that party leaders will be designated for each State and the States divided up into subdivisions with partisans appointed who will in turn select partisan enumerators in every district throughout the country, so this provision deceives no one.

A similar provision is contained in the rules and regulations promulgated by the Post Office Department. It is of no effect, as every Member of Congress knows. There are a number of instances in my district where ex-service men with military preference have been disregarded, and in each instance partisans appointed in their stead. This has occurred in a number of instances where ex-service men have applied for positions as rural carriers. Only last week an ex-service man, Will N. Blair, was certified as eligible, with a military preference, for appointment as postmaster at Hitchita, Okla., in my district, and the department went so far as to notify Members of Congress and Senators of the eligibility of young Blair; but instead of his being appointed, an excuse was made to call for another examination in order to afford an opportunity for a partisan to take the examination.

So you see therefore that this provision may deceive the public, but certainly no Member of Congress should be deceived by it.

I voted for the apportionment bill. The Constitution requires that the census be taken every 10 years, and in my judgment it is the plain duty of Congress to make the apportionment.

I voted against the Tinkham amendment, which was designed to cut down representation in the South. Everyone understood its purpose.

I voted for the Hoch amendment to exclude aliens from the count in making the apportionment. It is stated in debate that there are approximately 5,600,000 unnaturalized aliens in the country, and about half of them who have illegally entered and who are not citizens of the United States. Those aliens who have come to our country for the purpose of permanently residing here should be required to become citizens.

I voted to take the census on May 1, 1930, instead of on November 1, 1929, because I believe that date would find on the farm more of the rural population of the country, and for that reason enable the enumerators to take a more accurate census of the farm population.

The present conference report fixes the date as April 1, 1930, and I shall vote for that.

It was urged in the debate on the former conference report, fixing November 1, 1929, as the date for the beginning of the taking of the census, that it was done in order to have a report of the census prior to the beginning of the short term of Congress the first Monday in December, 1930, to enable Congress to make the apportionment. Of course, that argument was camouflage. Nobody in Congress ever believed that Congress would be called upon to make any further apportionment, but that it will be done by the Secretary of Commerce under the provisions of the bill.

Members of Congress may think they are fooling the country by this kind of argument but we in the House know that when any Member makes it he is looking one way and talking another.

I favor retaining the membership of the House at 435 and not increasing the number. I did not favor delegating the appointment to the Secretary of Commerce. Congress should assume its own responsibility. It is a dangerous precedent to delegate this authority which belongs to Congress. However, believing that the Constitution requires apportionment every 10 years and having voted for all apportionment bills, and being unable to secure the legislation because of the opposition of States that stand to lose one or more Members, I voted for this apportionment bill and will vote for this conference report. [Applause.]

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I am greatly pleased to see the reapportionment bill pass the last stage in the House on its way to final enactment. It marks the culmination of nearly five years of earnest effort on my part.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman never had any trouble on this side of the House with the census bill.

Mr. TILSON. Oh, the trouble was on both sides. The trouble has not been confined to one side of the House. I find that I misunderstood the gentleman. I thought he was referring to the reapportionment bill.

Mr. RANKIN. There has been no difficulty on this side of the House so far as the census bill was concerned.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman is correct. There has been no difficulty anywhere on the census bill.

Mr. RANKIN. In other words, we have tried to secure the adoption of a census bill, but it has been blocked in other quarters.

Mr. TILSON. As the gentleman has stated, the matter of the census has not caused the trouble. The real trouble has been to secure a reapportionment law.

When I became majority leader in 1925, the first problem to which I turned my attention was reapportionment. Five years had elapsed since the 1920 census was taken and no reapportionment had been made. I felt deeply that one of the basic provisions upon which our Government is founded was being ignored. Five years more would probably further accentuate the differences in the rate of growth in population in the several States, and I greatly feared that a revelation of these differences by the next census would make it impossible to reapportion without the necessity of greatly increasing the membership of the House, which I should consider most unfortunate. In casting about I struck upon the plan of passing anticipatory legislation to be effective in case the Congress in which the census is taken should fail to make reapportionment. I studied the constitutional side of the question, and became convinced that it was sound. I then called into conference my colleague, Mr. FENN, who had become chairman of the House Committee on the Census, and he agreed to introduce and sponsor such a bill, which he did.

During the Sixty-ninth Congress Mr. FENN was unable to get a favorable report out of his committee, but in order to demonstrate that at least a majority of Republicans in the House favored reapportionment it was brought up on suspension of the rules, but, of course, did not receive the necessary two-thirds to suspend the rules. In the first session of the Seventieth Congress a new bill was reported out and brought before the House for a vote, but was defeated by being recommitted to the Committee on the Census. In the second session of the Seventieth Congress it was again brought out and at last received the necessary votes and went to the Senate, where it died at the end of the Congress.

I was one of those to request President Hoover to include reapportionment in his message to the extra session of the Seventy-first Congress, and he did so. This time the Senate acted first and passed the bill. When it came to the House everyone knows what happened. In Committee of the Whole two amendments were at first added, which if they remained in the bill doomed it to certain defeat. Probably a clear majority of the House favored the Hoch amendment, which added aliens to the excluded class, while another clear majority, constituted quite differently, favored the Tinkham amendment excluding disfranchised negroes from being counted for representation. Enough Members to defeat it would not vote for the bill if either amendment remained in it, and with both in the bill it was surely doomed.

My task was to have eliminated both amendments. The method used was the simple one of offering in Committee of the Whole an amendment to strike out the entire section relating to reapportionment and insert substantially the original Senate provision in somewhat different phraseology. To secure votes enough to adopt such an amendment it was necessary to combine the two groups opposing each of the offending amendments, thus using each of these amendments to kill off the other. It was like mixing an acid with an alkali to neutralize both, or the old story of the two Kilkenny cats each destroying the other. My amendment once adopted entirely cleared the situation for upon a record vote in the House, if my amendment should fail to carry, the language of the Senate provision, not materially different, would remain in the bill.

The final result is that when President Hoover approves the bill it will become the permanent reapportionment law unless and until a new act is substituted for it hereafter; so that unless this act is repealed nevermore will there be danger of failing to reapportion after each decennial census as contemplated in the Constitution. It is a matter of personal gratification that the permanent reapportionment law will be in the exact language of the amendment offered by me.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who spoke on the conference report yesterday and who have spoken to-day be permitted to extend their remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that all Members who spoke on the conference report yesterday and who spoke to-day may be permitted to extend their remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, why not make the request apply to all Members of the House?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I am willing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that all Members may have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the census and reapportionment bill. Is there objection?

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will this be the finish of this thing? We have had it before us for a long time, and if this will end it I do not want to object, but if this is not the finish I do not want to consent to the extension of remarks or anything else.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CHINDBLOM, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the House of the following titles, which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

MILK RIVER RECLAMATION PROJECT, MONTANA

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of H. R. 3317, a bill to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the paragraph of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes" (Public, No. 1033, 70th Cong.), referring to the Milk River project, Montana, be amended to read as follows:

"Milk River project, Montana: For operation and maintenance, Chinook, Malta, and Glasgow divisions, $17,000; continuation of construction, $17,000; in all, $34,000."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], as I stated yesterday and I repeat it now, that you are not going to pass bills of this character until you first recognize the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW] for permission to consider a simple resolution in which he is interested, and about which he spoke to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] in my presence. I understand the Speaker has declined to recognize him, and until the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW] is recognized to have that resolution considered you will not get unanimous consent to consider this particular bill or any other bill outside of the aviation bill and the one I mentioned yesterday.

Mr. WOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that I have no objection whatever to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW] having his resolution considered; in fact, I think it ought to be considered.

Mr. GARNER. I agree with the gentleman. The Speaker has been requested to recognize him, but, as I understand, he has declined to do so. You are not going to get unanimous consent to have some recognized on that side of the House to pass a dozen bills when recognition is denied to one gentleman for the consideration of one resolution.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Texas will permit, the Chair has not declined to recognize the gentleman from Indiana, but has merely said that, there being certain other bills of this same character, the Chair thought all of those bills should be considered at the same time. The Chair will be glad to recognize the gentleman from Indiana at the proper time.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I desire to corroborate what the Chair has said. There has been no actual declination to recognize me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no doubt that the gentleman from Indiana will receive recognition at the proper time.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I want to make myself clear. This morning the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT] was to see me concerning this bill as well as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD]. I think it is a fair bill, but I think some recognition should be given to this side of the House. So far as I recall there has not been a single request made by this side of the House at this session.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. How about the Florida bugs?

Mr. SNELL. The first thing that came up during this session was from that side of the House; in fact, I think there were two of them.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

INTERNATIONAL TECHNICAL CONSULTING COMMITTEE ON RADIO COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House Joint Resolution 102, making an appropriation for expenses of participation by the United States in the meeting of the International Technical Consulting Committee on Radio Communications, to be held at The Hague in September, 1929.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a House joint resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the sum of $35,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to remain available until June 30, 1930, to defray the expenses of participation by the United States in the meeting of the International Technical Consulting Committee on Radio Communications, to be held at The Hague in September, 1929, including travel and subsistence or per diem in lieu of subsistence (notwithstanding the provisions of any other act), compensation of employees, stenographic and other services by contract if deemed necessary, rent of office, purchase of necessary books and documents, printing and binding, official cards, and such other expenses as may be authorized by the Secretary of State.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, who selects these technicians?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. As I understand, the gentleman from Indiana and the former members of the Committee on Appropriations have considered this together, both Democrats and Republicans?

Mr. WOOD. We have.

Mr. GARNER. And it is a unanimous report?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

I will state to the House what is the purpose of this legislation.

In 1927 there was a convention of all the civilized countries on earth, including a lot I never heard of before, and they adopted a treaty with reference to international radio operation. One of the terms of the treaty provided that in September of this year there should be a conference of all the participating countries with reference to making suggestions and recommending modifications after the developments of 1927, concerning interference, wave lengths, and all that sort of thing, and it is very essential that the United States, having more at stake with reference to international radio, perhaps, than any other country upon the face of the earth, should participate.

I will say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] we asked Mr. Carr, of the State Department, who was before us this morning, the question the gentleman has propounded to me, and off the record he gave us the names of a very great many eminent gentlemen who are qualified along this line from whom the selections will be made. They are to be appointed by the Secretary of State.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will this convention go into the question of international allocation of wave lengths?

Mr. WOOD. That is one of the purposes of the convention.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And the Secretary will make the nominations or the selections.

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AIRPORTS FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution (H. J. Res. 100) making appropriation for the acquisition of lands for an airport or airports for the National Capital and the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Joint Resolution 100

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $500,000, to remain available until expended, for the acquisition by the National Capital Park and Planning Commission, subject to the approval of the Joint Commission on Airports, of lands, and/or options to purchase lands, for an airport or airports adequate for the needs of the National Capital and the District of Columbia: Provided, That any further appropriations for the acquisition of lands and/or options to purchase lands and/or for the development of such airport or airports shall be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and the Treasury of the United States in the manner prescribed for defraying the expenses of the District of Columbia by the District of Columbia appropriation acts for the fiscal years for which such appropriations are made.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman a question? As I understand, this legislation has the recommendation of the joint committee created by the Seventieth Congress to consider the question of aviation in the District of Columbia.

Mr. WOOD. That is correct.

Mr. GARNER. It also has the approval of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, which considered it this morning.

Mr. WOOD. It has the approval of those who were present this morning; yes.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman state who were present this morning?

Mr. WOOD. Yes. The chairman was present; Mr. DICKINSON, of Iowa, was present; Mr. WASON, of New Hampshire, was present; Mr. BUCHANAN, of Texas, was present; Mr. OLIVER, of Alabama, and Mr. SHREVE, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, do I understand that this appropriation of $500,000 covers only a part of the fund which will be necessary to purchase a site? How many thousand acres do you intend to purchase if this bill goes through?

Mr. WOOD. I will say to the gentleman we had a hearing this morning and it was disclosed that there are several sites in view. It is not advisable for the public to know the sites that the commission have under consideration, because, as the gentleman knows, should it become public they are considering this, that, or the other site, immediately the real estate gentlemen would get options and $250 land would go up to $1,000.

The purpose of this appropriation is to aid the commission in buying either land or options looking to the establishment of an airport. It is contemplated it will take much more than $500,000 to do this, but the only part that will be contributed by the Government is $500,000, no matter what the eventual cost may be.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. How many acres are necessary for this airport?

Mr. UNDERHILL. About 1,000.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Has the Committee on Appropriations or this joint committee on airports checked up the assessed valuation of the property included in the various sites they have been considering, so as to arrive at a reasonable estimate of the cost of the site?

Mr. WOOD. That is one of the things they will do. As I say, the very reason there should be no publicity with reference to whether they are going to buy this, that, or the other site, is in order that the Government may not be held up by these real estate sharks.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. The gentleman well knows that the Federal Treasury is quite often raided to the tune of millions of dollars by real estate speculators. This existing evil could be cured if you would have the owners of the proposed sites for this airport submit their sworn affidavits indicating the value of their properties, and then after you decide to purchase one site, certify the valuation placed upon the other pieces of property to the assessor and have the owners assessed on their own valuation. In this way you would stop the real estate speculation raids on the Public Treasury in the District of Columbia. [Applause.] In view of the statement of the gentleman from Indiana that it is necessary to keep certain matters secret in order to protect the Treasury, I shall not object to the consideration of the bill although I have been constrained to object by reason of the continual raiding of the people's Treasury by real estate speculators in the District of Columbia.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, permit me to say to the gentleman that the system of secrecy adopted now was abandoned some 30 years ago in the purchase of land for public services. Every real estate monger in the District of Columbia knows exactly what is going on, and you are not keeping any information at all from the real-estate people. If you think you are doing that, you are mistaken. This matter of an airport is of the utmost importance. It is of importance for the people of the District, for the people of the country, and for the people interested in aviation to know where this airport is going to be.

I, as a Member of Congress, resent the idea that any committee may come in and say to the House, "We know where it is going to be, but we can not tell you."

Mr. WOOD. Let me make this suggestion to the gentleman from New York, and I think he will agree with me that the plan of the committee is a good one. We can take a small sum of money and get options on a tract of land in one section near Washington and then do the same thing in a half dozen other places. Then after we have the options the Congress will be advised where these sites are. There is no desire on the part of the commission to keep from Congress where they intend eventually to locate. But for the purpose of obviating the very thing spoken of by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER], that the Treasury shall not be robbed or held up, they would like to exercise their discretion, without making public here to-day the different tracts that they have in view.

Mr. LAGUARDIA.. There is no great danger as long as we have the right of condemnation. Do not you trust the courts?

Mr. WOOD. If the gentleman will review the experience of the Government in condemnation proceedings, he will find that it costs the Government a great deal more under condemnation proceedings than they would have to pay at private purchase.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That statement coming from me would be all right, but I am rather surprised to hear it from the conservative gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. WOOD. I can give the gentleman many concrete examples.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will not the gentleman let this go over until to-morrow?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DICKINSON). Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Still reserving the right to object.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield to me?

Mr. WOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Ever since I have been in Congress I have been a member of the District Committee. It has been my one ambition sometime or other to secure for this Government some land within or without the District without paying a tremendous tribute to the real-estate operators.

Up to the present time I have failed. I can cite numerous instances where the Government has paid millions of dollars more than it ought to have paid both through direct purchase and by condemnation proceedings.

I will cite one, and that is the triangle property with which all Members are familiar. In 1923 when the bill to purchase this property was first introduced by me the triangle was assessed for something in the vicinity of $15,000,000. It could have been purchased without doubt for $17,000,000. It was a period of economy and the President refused to approve of the proposition.

Two years later Congress passed an appropriation for a $15,000,000 bridge adjacent to this property and the Assessors of the District immediately placed $2,000,000 additional value on the property. In 1928, appropriations were authorized and the property will be purchased at a cost of $50,000,000. That is what it cost the Government six years after it could have been bought for $15,000,000.

I could cite several other instances, but I will only cite one in the experience of this commission. We were very much interested in a certain tract of land not far from the city of Washington. In open hearings we began to discuss the prices and the availability of this tract of land. We found it could be bought for about $200 an acre, and a thousand acres was involved in the transaction. Two weeks later at another meeting a representative of some real estate interests came before us and stated that the land was held at $2,000 an acre.

Now, gentlemen, it may be unusual to push legislation in this way and manner, but I believe—I could almost guarantee—that we could save $2,000,000 for the District of Columbia if we could go out to-morrow and purchase this land or take options on it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is the gentleman on the commission?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What is the plan of the commission—to select a site? I suppose the commission will confer with the people who are interested in a proper site, and then come in and get authorization for that particular site, or to close the deal, first?

Mr. UNDERHILL. No. There are several locations. The moment you mention one of them or two of them or three of them, the price jumps 100, 200, 300 per cent. When the Government attempted to take by condemnation proceedings certain lands for the new Botanic Gardens, the advance over the assessed valuation ran all the way from 115 per cent to 700 per cent.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But the gentleman's commission must necessarily negotiate with the owners of the land.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The commission is not going to negotiate. The Park and Planning Commission that has negotiated the purchase of land in and around the District for park purposes, through their regular channels or agents, is going to try to secure this land at the lowest possible price.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But the site will be selected by the gentleman's commission?

Mr. UNDERHILL. All of the sites are suggested by this commission.

Mr. WOOD. The final determination, the gentleman means.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Oh, yes; of course.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Can we be assured that the Park and Planning Commission, which is to obtain options on the various sites, will submit the value claimed by the owners of the site which are not purchased to the assessor, so that he can assess for full valuation? If they do that, they will prevent exploitation in this case.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I suppose they will follow the usual business method of business organizations. If you were going to build a factory in some city or State, you would not advertise that you were in the market for a certain site. You would go to some one you could trust, and ask him to secure options on the particular land you desire. After the options had been secured on that land, if the price were too high, you would go to another site, and you would buy where you could do the best for your particular interests. The Government has not been able to do that. It does not employ sound business methods that would be used by others. Congress advertises that the Government or the District is in the market for so many thousand feet or so many thousand acres of land, and then that land is optioned by men who never heretofore owned a foot of it, and it is held at a price that is almost prohibitive.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. They must have been learning from Tammany.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Oh, no. They can give Tammany points.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Oklahoma. Has it ever been called to the attention of the Department of Justice that we have statutes about conspiracy to defraud the Government?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has not answered my question. What I want to find out is this:

If there are three or four proposed sites, and the owners of those sites demand of the Government certain amounts in payment for those sites after a site is selected, will the assessor of the District of Columbia then be given the actual value furnished by the owners of the rejected sites, so that he can assess them at their value designated by the owners? In that way you will save hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Let me say to the gentleman, at the risk of giving out some information valuable to land speculators, that we are not interested in the purchase of land in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Well, the purchase of land outside.

Mr. UNDERHILL. We do not hold control over that.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I shall object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Surely the gentleman does not want to put himself in the position that he has caused the Government to pay two, three, or four million dollars extra money, because he, and he alone, thinks he has the only solution of this question?

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, the Government of the United States has a right to go out and condemn this land and take it and have a jury pass upon its value and cut down the price to suit itself.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Oh, no, no.

Mr. GARRETT. Why, certainly it has.

Mr. UNDERHILL. No; the Government of the United States has to give what the court or the jury or the referee decides the land is worth.

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I have not objected, but I expect to ask for some information, and I resent the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] as applied to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] because the latter sees fit to exercise his constitutional right as a Representative in this House in respect to the passage of this bill, which has never been referred to any regular committee of the House. The gentleman from Massachusetts seeks to place the gentleman from Wisconsin in the category of being in a conspiracy with those who would hold up this Government in the purchase of this land, and I think that the remarks were uncalled for [applause], and that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] was beyond his rights when he undertook to so characterize a Member of this House, who has as much right on the floor and as much right to his opinion about bills in this House as has the gentleman from Massachusetts. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes; if I have the floor.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The gentleman has known me long enough to know that I never would intentionally or purposely impugn the motives of any of my colleagues. If I have established any one thing since I have been in Congress, it is a reputation for fair play. If, in the heat of argument, I reflected in any way, shape, or manner on the gentleman from Wisconsin, I withdraw everything I said, and request the reporter to eliminate it. I trust the gentleman from Wisconsin will pardon me for an unintentional error. I have made all the amends I possibly can. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I understand that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] has devoted a great deal of time to the study of this airport question. I have served with him on the Claims Committee, of which he is chairman, and know that he is an exceptionally conscientious and hard-working Member of Congress.

The gentleman's intense desire to have a great airport in or near the Nation's Capital may have caused him to utter a few words which I might object to. However, I am not one of those who object to a unanimous-consent request because of personal animosity, temporary or permanent, and in view of what has transpired and the information obtained under the right to object, I will withdraw my objection to the consideration of the legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, even at the risk of being characterized as a member of a conspiracy——

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I have withdrawn that and apologized for it. Can I do any more?

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman could not and I will not again refer to the matter. I have always entertained a high regard for the gentleman from Massachusetts personally and officially, and gladly acquit him of any such intention, but I do not take kindly to the idea that because a Member wants to get information on a bill or objects to its consideration he is to be charged with improper motives when he is only exercising what are his rights.

I was not present at the meeting this morning. I had a hearing on a very important subject in one of the departments in which my constituents were interested. I want to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] some questions in regard to this particular bill, and first I want to say this by way of preface, that I think if we are going to continue to consider bills upon the floor of this House on the ground that somebody thinks it is an emergency, we ought to have a regular organization in the House, so that committees can function on the matters over which they have jurisdiction. [Applause.]

We are asked here in this case and in other cases to consider legislation which ought to go to a regular committee of the House, where the members of the committee could hold hearings and present their report in writing to the House, with a recommendation as to what they think should be done. As the situation is now, we have no Committee on Appropriations organized. It is true that the prospective chairman, the gentleman from Indiana, gives close consideration to these matters, but Members of the House should be enabled to properly consider legislation like this. Some Members, in good conscience, of course, believe that it is to the public interest to have these matters considered, but I do not think under the present organization of the House we should take up matters except those of a really emergency character.

I am not impressed by the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] that this is an emergency. Of course, the price or value of land may go up, but I do not know that the prices of real estate are increasing in the city of Washington or any other place at this time, and if the matter were taken up in December I think there would be the same scramble and no more on the part of real-estate interests here to increase values and increase their profits through the transfer of their property that there is now.

There is another thing I would like to have explained. This bill undertakes to take out of the Treasury of the United States $500,000 to purchase this land, coupled with the provision in the resolution that any subsequent appropriations for the acquisition of land shall be made under the law as it now prevails, with reference to revenues in the District of Columbia, to which the United States makes a contribution.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. DYER. I understand from the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] that none of this land which it is proposed to purchase is within the District of Columbia. I would like to ask the distinguished member of the Committee on Appropriations how he can justify our action here in this proposed legislation in providing out of the District revenues funds to purchase land not in the District of Columbia?

Mr. BYRNS. It is for the District of Columbia.

Mr. DYER. It is for the whole country.

Mr. BYRNS. I can not agree with the gentleman upon the statement that it is for the whole country. Down in my own home city, which is one-third of the size of the city of Washington, they are making an appropriation now for a quarter of a million dollars to provide an airport outside of the city limits out of the taxes paid by the citizens of that city.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is done all over the country.

Mr. BYRNS. There is not a city of any size in this country that is not undertaking to establish airports, and they are not asking for aid from the Federal Treasury. The United States Government has an airport in the city of Washington over at Bolling Field for the War Department and the Navy Department. Why should we be called upon to make this whole contribution? Why was not this provision that is made with reference to money hereafter needed not made applicable to this $500,000?

Mr. WOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. WOOD. I will say to the gentleman that Senator BINGHAM was before us and I asked him that very question. I cited the fact that all over this country these airports had been built and maintained by the municipalities. I cited several concrete instances, and the answer is this: This is to be a commercial airport, and these are commercial airports in these cities to which I referred. The airport in the gentleman's city is a commercial port, and this can not obtain here because of the fact that there is but little commerce here. As we all know, there are no manufacturing industries here, and I hope there never will be, but the visitation to this airport will be constantly growing by reason of the increased use of the airplane.

The big business we have here is the Government, the biggest business in the world, and those who come here come in large part in the transaction of business or else seeking pleasure and education. Now, the airport for the Navy is a limited concern, and it is hardly large enough for the use of the Navy. The airport for the Army is a limited concern, and for the purpose of accommodating it to the uses of the Army it is proposed to enlarge it. So to my mind the answer given by Senator BINGHAM was proper and the suggestion that other cities are establishing airports for their commercial development can not apply to the city of Washington.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. DYER. I want to ask the gentleman this question: Of what benefit can an airport be commercially to the city of Washington, which is not a city engaged in commerce? It is all right for my city and the gentleman's city to have airports because it is money in our pockets.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What do you want the passengers to do? Drop from parachutes?

Mr. DYER. I wanted to know of what benefit it could be to the District of Columbia and why we should tax the people of the District for this purpose?

Mr. WOOD. I have stated as best I could the reasons why the Government should contribute, and it strikes me the reason offered by Senator BINGHAM was a very satisfactory explanation as to why we should make an exception in this case—namely, because this is to be a national airport. People come from all over the country to the National Capital not for the purpose of exploiting their commerce but for the purpose of transacting business of state, for the purpose of pleasure, or, if you please, in their intercourse between one section of the country and some other section of the country.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. Yes.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. The gentleman has characterized this airport as a national airport. It might be interesting and possibly have some bearing on this subject to know what foreign governments have done. I would like to know whether the gentleman has any information as to whether Croydon, the great British airport; Le Bourget, the great airport outside of Paris; or the Tempel Hof Airport, in Germany, have been constructed by national, municipal, or private funds.

Mr. WOOD. Some of them are both. Senator BINGHAM entered into that this morning and the hearings make a very complete showing. There are several in France and some in Germany.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. What are the facts?

Mr. WOOD. The government participated in the building of those airports and they are used for commercial purposes and they are also used by the government for governmental purposes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield to me?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield if I have the floor.

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman from Tennessee has the floor.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] has cited the instance of his home city of Nashville, and I might as well cite the case of my home city and so might practically every Representative cite the case of his home city. In many of our cities the people are spending their own money for airports and asking the Government for nothing whatever.

The chief use of airports in most of these cities, such as the gentleman's, and my own, is for the mail service and by the National Guard and other military forces. Talk about commercial uses has little or no application. There is no commercial business worth talking about done in many of these airports throughout the country. Where there is any commercial use, it chiefly has connection with the distributing business, of which Washington is a considerable center. Washington has more business of distribution than dozens of cities which are providing airports at their own expense. The Government has already provided at its own sole expense for a Navy airport and for an Army airport in Washington and has no use for the third airport provided by this bill. It is purely a local matter for purely local purposes. Washington is the richest city per capita in the whole country and its tax rate is less than half many other cities.

When we analyze these alleged reasons why Washington should be preferred above other cities and be furnished an airport at the Government's expense they disappear. The fact is that there is no more reason why the Government should pay for an airport for the city of Washington than for the city of Birmingham, Nashville, Louisville, or any other city in the country.

Now, that is one reaction I have on this subject. Another is, we have heard talk that the Government is to make this expenditure and that is all it is to be asked to do. We have heard such talk before and yet we have found that back they came in the next session to ask the Government to do something more. The people of Washington, that is to say, the very small fraction of Washington that is vocal or is able to get its voice over to the public, is already complaining of the inadequacy of this proposed appropriation—they say it is a very small part of what they insist Congress should do for them on the airport. The morning paper records the complaint that the alleged "stepchild of Congress," but in reality the "spoiled child of Congress," is making because we do not make a more adequate appropriation. A mere $500,000 donation by the Government toward the airport "is not within decency," so they say, it is "unjust, unequal, and unfair." You can not satisfy them no matter how much you give them.

I want Washington to have everything she wants but I want Washington to pay her own way just like other cities have to do. I am tired of Washington's selfish raids on the Treasury.

Let me say to the gentleman from Tennessee that I have no desire to cut off discussion but I intend to object to this bill when the proper time is reached. It will not get through with my consent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMMONS. Gentlemen, about this time of year the Congress is in receipt of a series of attacks directed along the line of those just mentioned by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON]. At the present time we are in the initial stages of another campaign to get more money out of the Federal Treasury for the District of Columbia. This has been evidenced by editorials appearing in the Washington press during the last two or three days, evidenced by the action of the Citizens' Advisory Council last night, evidenced again by the action of the board of trade, who, according to the press, have stated that they are going to ask the President to appoint a national committee of economic advisers to study the problem of fiscal relations of the United States and the District of Columbia.

Every study of fiscal relations that has been made, either by the House or the Senate, by the Bureau of Efficiency or by the Bureau of the Census—all of them have demonstrated the fact that Washington is now, if anything, undertaxed and not overtaxed, and that the contribution of the Federal Government is not only fair but generous. Yet, as I say, we are in the annual campaign to try to get more money out of the Federal Treasury.

I want to refer to two editorials that appeared in the press yesterday having to do with the municipal-center appropriation that passed the House last week, and, in part, with the appropriation that has been under discussion here to-day.

Yesterday morning's Washington Post contained this statement:

> The $3,000,000 fund deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the District of Columbia is made up exclusively of taxpayers' dollars. Not one penny of Federal money is contained therein.

That statement is absolutely false. The $7,000,000, approximately, now the surplus in the Federal Treasury to the credit of the District of Columbia, has been accumulated by the wise expenditure of District funds over the past few years. It is an accumulation or a surplus made up out of the joint funds collected from the general revenues of the District of Columbia, plus the $9,000,000 contributed by the Federal Government. Anybody who knows anything about the fiscal policy and the handling of funds here knows that this is true.

The only way they can argue that that statement is true is to state that before any money is spent out of District revenues or out of taxpayers' funds, they spend the Federal Government's $9,000,000. If they want to take this angle of it, I could just as well say that before any of the $9,000,000 contributed by the Federal Government is spent, they spend all of their own money, and that this surplus is all Federal money. Neither statement is true. The surplus is made up and the money that will be spent if the Senate acts upon the municipal center resolution is the result of the savings from the combined payments of the people of the District of Columbia plus the contribution of the Government of the United States.

Then the same editorial states, going on:

> And if it is used for purchasing the site for the municipal center the Federal Government will be let off without paying even its customary niggardly share of the expense of making District improvements. This will be particularly apparent if the balance of the cost of developing the municipal center is raised through sale of the present District Building to the Government.

This refers to a proposal I made to the Secretary of the Treasury that the United States buy the present District Building, give the District credit for the present value of it, and allow the District to remain in possession and use of it until a new District Building could be built on the proposed municipal center site.

Here are the facts about the present building. The land on which the building rests was bought and paid for 50 per cent by the United States Government and 50 per cent by the people of the District of Columbia. The building was paid for in the same way. It cost approximately $2,500,000; or, in other words, the present District Building costing two and a half million dollars, is owned equitably 50 per cent by the District of Columbia and 50 per cent by the Government of the United States.

My proposal was that we not divide it in that way, but that we pay the present value of the building to the District government and allow them to build a new building from the proceeds. The District has the user right in the building. I propose to buy that right for the use of the United States. It is estimated that this cost would be about $5,000,000. I have advised the Secretary of the Treasury that I am willing to accept the value placed thereon by the present District assessor. In other words, I am proposing to give to the District of Columbia $5,000,000, or whatever they agree upon as the proper figure, in return for their investment of $1,250,000, and their right of user in the present building, and yet they complain, and the Washington Star, a few days ago, referred to this proposal as a "confiscation" of the District Building by the United States.

Yesterday, in the Evening Star, the same statement that none of this surplus was Federal money was made and I need not discuss that in view of my discussion of the statement in the Post.

Then they make the statement that "the Federal Government, which in 1921, decided that 40 per cent constituted its fair share in District appropriation bills, will be contributing approximately 20 per cent plus in the 1930 appropriations."

That statement is false and anyone can find out it is not true in five minutes. They say "20 per cent plus." The plus is 8 per cent. We are paying this year approximately 28 per cent of the cost of running the municipal government in the District of Columbia out of Federal funds. The time has come when the papers of Washington ought to be willing to tell the people of this city the truth about the subject of fiscal relations.

Then they go on and discuss the matter of a Federal airport and then wind up in the matter of the municipal center with this statement:

> The next step in providing for financing both airport and municipal center is to return to the fixed-ratio policy of appropriation.

That "fixed ratio policy" the Congress has repeatedly rejected and in my judgment will continue to reject—

> Unless there is a return to this principle, or unless the intent of that principle is accomplished by generously increasing the lump sum, this Federal airport now about to be authorized will represent a grossly unfair burden, resulting from tyrannical treatment of unrepresented taxpayers.

And then this:

> The municipal center will represent an extravagance wished on these taxpayers who must take it as a luxury and let their necessities slide by the board.

Gentlemen, I do not believe that statement represents the sentiment of the people of Washington. If it does I am ready to say that the municipal center ought to stop right where it is now.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Did not the Evening Star a few months ago, when the thing was first contemplated, come out with a strong editorial urging it?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; the Evening Star was one of the first papers advocating a municipal center. They have asked for it; they have urged it; until now, when they think they are going to get it, they come out and object to paying for it. The Federal Government does not owe the District of Columbia a municipal center. If it wants a municipal center—and we were led to believe by the board of trade, the chamber of commerce, the District Commissioners, by the newspapers and others, that the municipal center was needed—I have been trying to help them to get it. Congress has said they shall have it. The House by unanimous consent at this session appropriated money for the purchase of land for the municipal center as a necessity for the District of Columbia, and not as a luxury. We can go ahead on the plan that has been advocated and develop a municipal center in Washington which would be of use to the city and a thing of beauty without increasing the tax burden unduly for the people of Washington and without increased contribution from the Federal Government and without unduly curtailing other expenditures. But if it is not done, ladies and gentlemen, by Congress it will be because of the fact that a few who are selfishly trying to save something for themselves in taxes misrepresent the sentiment of the people of Washington in this matter as to what is being and will be done. [Applause.]

THE TARIFF BILL

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the tariff.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, in discussing the 1929 tariff legislation it is well to remember that it has been passed under the same kind of a rule and under similar conditions to every other tariff bill since the days of the Civil War. Anyone that knows legislative procedure knows that in the House of Representatives a tariff bill, with all of its schedules, could not be thrown up to general amendment. For this reason some other plan must be adopted. The plan to be adopted has usually been a rule limiting amendments to committee amendments coming from the Republican side of the Ways and Means Committee. I am making this statement to show that no exceptional rule was adopted in this case, but that the usual method of procedure was followed.

It is also well to remember that the present tariff bill is as yet not a law. This bill has not made one-third of its legislative journey to the White House. The bill must pass the Senate, where it is subjected to a severe revision and review, and then it must pass through conference, where it is again revised and reviewed, and then, after the conference reports are adopted by both bodies, the same is finally sent to the White House. I suggest this for the reason that a great many people think that the House voted on the bill in the form in which it was to become a law. Such was not the case.

Agriculture has been emphasized throughout the campaign and the tariff revision was presumably for the benefit of agriculture. However, anyone knowing the personnel of the legislative machinery through which tariff revision must come knows perfectly well that it would be impossible to limit the revision to strictly agricultural schedules. Business is too good a guardian of its own cause to permit such a procedure. For this reason when the tariff bill was presented to the House it was necessary for the friends of agriculture to determine the plan of procedure and the tactics to be used by which they could secure the most beneficial results for farm products. I am convinced that this program was effectively worked out and was successful in its results. When the tariff bill reached the floor of the House many commodities produced on the farm were left without protection. A program was then adopted whereby the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee would hear the various Members of Congress asking for protection on various commodities in which they were interested. The result of this demand is shown by the amendments offered by the committee themselves to the agricultural schedules with increases as follows:

Commodities	Rates of duty
	Act of 1922	Bill as reported	Bill as amended
Live cattle	Weighing less than 1,050 pounds each, 1½ cents per pound; weighing 1,050 pounds or more, 2 cents per pound.	No change	Weighing less than 800 pounds, 2 cents per pound; weighing 800 pounds or more, 2½ cents per pound.
Dried skimmed milk	1½ cents per pound	do	2½ cents per pound.

Commodities	Rates of duty
	Act of 1922	Bill as reported	Bill as amended
Olive oil in packages weighing less than 40 pounds	7½ cents per pound	No change	8½ cents per pound.
White or Irish potatoes	50 cents per 100 pounds	do	75 cents per 100 pounds.
Pecans:
Not shelled	3 cents per pound	do	5 cents per pound.
Shelled	6 cents per pound	do	10 cents per pound.
Tomatoes:
Tomato paste	40 per cent ad valorem	25 per cent ad valorem	40 per cent ad valorem.
Prepared or preserved (canned)	15 per cent ad valorem	do	Do.
Onions	1½ cents per pound (increased from 1 cent by President).	1¾ cents per pound	2 cents per pound.
White clover seed	3 cents per pound	5 cents per pound	6 cents per pound.
Ladino clover seed	2 cents per pound	do	Do.
Bluegrass seed	do	No change	5 cents per pound.
Cattle hides and skins	Free	do	10 per cent ad valorem.
Broomcorn	do	do	$10 per ton of 2,000 pounds.
Rice straw and rice fiber	do	do	Do.
Wrapper tobacco:
Unstemmed	$2.10 per pound	do	$2.50 per pound.
Stemmed	$2.75 per pound	do	$3.15 per pound.
Flaxseed	56 cents per bushel (increased from 40 cents by President).	56 cents per bushel	63 cents per bushel.
Peanuts, shelled	4 cents per pound	6 cents per pound	7 cents per pound.
Locust and carob beans and pods and seeds thereof	8 cents per pound under paragraph 762	No change	Free.

You will note that the increases in the right-hand column were granted by amendment of the Ways and Means Committee after these hearings and were a direct result of the drive made by the friends of the farmer for increased protection.

It is true that many increases were granted on other commodities but when you study the list of commodities on which other increases were granted you will find that in volume of trade they are very insignificant so far as the farmer is concerned. For instance, there has been a marked increase on saddles, which is listed as one of the offsets to the benefits received by the farmer; also on velvet ribbons, braids, bristles, cotton rags, pipe bowls, dolls, toys, and so forth.

The thing I want to suggest is that the farmer sells livestock from his farm every year, butter every week, and milk every day. These tariff schedules are beneficial to him every day in the year, while on many of the manufactured schedules he is not interested in the price of the commodity from a purchaser's standpoint more often than once a year and on some of them once in a lifetime. In fact, we do not buy any more saddles in Iowa. We sell butter every day and cattle every year.

I am making this suggestion for the reason that those who attempt to show that agriculture has not been given fair consideration are reaching a conclusion that nothing but experience will demonstrate. It has always been my theory that if you permitted the farmer to get a fair return on what he had for sale, he would govern his purchases of other commodities according to his available funds, and that if you increased his returns on the farm he could regulate his expenditures to fit his own economic condition.

As an illustration, I want to suggest that I am a convert to the fact that under our present tariff system the only plausible way to approach a problem is to start with the raw product and grant a tariff on all of the processed products therefrom, clear up to the finished product purchased by the consumer. A great deal has been said about shoes. Raw hides has been one of the commodities over which tariff debate has been waged for many years. We finally were granted a low ad valorem duty on hides, and with this duty came the compensating duties on leather and shoes. In approaching this question it is well to remember that in former years we had exactly the same discussion over a tariff on wool and compensatory duties on cloth and clothing. The same argument was made against a tariff on wool that is now being made against a tariff on hides. However, who challenges the advisability of a tariff on wool at the present time? I am thoroughly convinced that a tariff on hides will be reflected in the price of cattle. Those opposing the tariff on hides are the largest shoe manufacturers in the United States. However, the early negotiations of the Ways and Means Committee indicated a tariff on leather and a tariff on shoes with no duty on hides. Just remember that the tariff on shoes requested, as well as the tariff on leather requested, was even higher than the tariff now granted with a tariff also recommended on hides.

The leather business is prostrate in the United States; the shoe business is meeting competition from Czechoslovakia that is very severe. Advertisements are now being put in the various papers showing shoes, both men's and women's, for sale at a low price made in Czechoslovakia. We also find that under the old McKinley tariff bill the tariff on hides was 15 per cent, on leather 20 per cent, and on shoes 25 per cent. For a great many years in Canada the tariff on hides has been 17½ per cent, the tariff on leather 25 per cent, and the tariff on shoes 30 per cent. With our experimental schedule here we have a lower compensatory duty on both leather and shoes than has ever been granted in any other tariff bill in this country or any other country so far as I know. I am simply wanting to impress upon you the conclusion that the experiment is worth while at these rates and that the economic adjustment can be made as experience develops the facts as to just what the proper compensatory rates should be.

The legislative program adopted by those interested in farm protection was to secure from the committee in every available way the very best protective rates on farm commodities that could be secured, on the theory that these rates could be held in the Senate and they would be able to be carried through the conference and really written into law. For this reason we adopted the theory of not attacking a reduction in other rates to which many of us were opposed, but permitting those rates to become the subject of public criticism and attacked before the Senate. Many of us believe that before this bill is really through conference the excessive rates on some building materials and other commodities which to us are apparently too high will be reduced, while, on the other hand, the farm rates that we have put into the bill will be able to carry through in the law until the bill is placed on final passage. In my judgment, in this way we are going to secure for agriculture the very best possible results that can be secured from the present Congress under present economic conditions.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Dakota?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. If there are any other gentlemen who desire to address the House; if so, perhaps it better be determined now.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes with reference to one of my colleagues.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes after the address by the gentleman from Florida.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Reserving the right to object, and I do not intend to object to gentlemen making speeches, but I would like to ask if the Speaker is to recognize anyone else this afternoon to ask unanimous consent to pass legislation?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would prefer to answer that question at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. GARNER. The situation is this: I will suggest to the Speaker and to the gentleman from Connecticut that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW] has a little resolution that has been investigated by gentlemen on that side of the House, and to which they see no objection. But I understand it is being held back so that it may connect with other legislation such as the gentleman from North Dakota is about to address himself to. I do not like that kind of an arrangement. I think the Ludlow resolution should be submitted to the House, and if there is any objection let those who object take the responsibility. This continual putting him off does not seem fair to him. I am not going to object to these speeches, but I do give you a little warning about future legislation.

Mr. HOWARD rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Nebraska rise?

Mr. HOWARD. I do not want to interfere with the gentleman from North Dakota, but I am going to remind the gentleman from Texas that there will be another request for special legislation. The Speaker has kindly consented to recognize me for that purpose, and I wanted to make that known.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the Chair recognizing anyone in the House for the purpose of asking unanimous consent for the consideration of any legislation, but it occurs to me that if we are going to have an hour's speech making and then unanimous consent, it will be a little out of order. We might first have had all of our unanimous consents, and then go on with speech making until 4 or 5 o'clock this afternoon if necessary.

The SPEAKER. Under the circumstances the Chair will not put these requests until after the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURTNESS].

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I do not want the Chair to put me in the attitude of objecting to the requests of these gentlemen. The Chair can take the responsibility of not submitting them if he desires to do so.

The SPEAKER. The Chair always likes to have the advice of the gentleman from Texas. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURTNESS].

THE ONE THOUSANDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE ALTHING, IN ICELAND

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, the occasion of my asking for this time this afternoon is to call attention of the House to a resolution which I introduced at the opening of the session, House Joint Resolution 2. In June of next year the very interesting little country of Iceland is going to hold a most remarkable celebration, because it will celebrate at that time the one thousandth anniversary of the establishment of the Icelandic Parliament, known as the Althing. Invitations to attend this celebration have been extended to all representative countries throughout the civilized world, including an invitation to the United States. The reasons impelling me to introduce my resolution are set forth in the preamble to the resolution, which I shall read, with the indulgence of the House:

Whereas Iceland, that most remarkable saga land of Europe, a sovereign State in a union with Denmark, will celebrate in 1930 the one thousandth anniversary of the establishment of its legislative body, and has invited the United States to participate therein; and

Whereas the present Parliament of Iceland, the Althing, was established in 930 on the famous "Thingvellir," not far from the present capital, and as a parliamentary body has a history spanning a greater number of centuries than that of any existing nation, and as such is an inspiration to all democratic governments; and

Whereas the first white man to set foot on American soil was a native son of Iceland, Leif Ericson (the son of Eric the Red, a Norwegian who had settled in Iceland), an able and fearless sailor, who in 985 accompanied his father to Greenland, and thereafter went thence on a cruise to Norway, and on the return trip in the year 1000 discovered the American mainland, which feat constitutes the beginning of authentic American history; and

Whereas the history of this intrepid little nation is otherwise in many ways interwoven with that of our own country through the scholarly influence of its remarkable literature and particularly by the settlement in the great Northwest of a goodly number of thrifty, hard-working, and intelligent people from Iceland who with their descendents not only constitute a noteworthy fraction of our best citizens but have also contributed much to the prosperity, the education, and scientific knowledge, the business acumen, the arts, and the culture of our Nation: Therefore be it resolved, etc.

Following this preamble in the enacting portion of the resolution I have provided for two things, first, the acceptance by the President of the invitation to participate in the celebration, including the appointment of five official delegates, and secondly, for the presentation by the Government of the United States of a suitable statue of or memorial to Leif Ericsson as a gift of the people of the United States to the people of Iceland.

As already stated, the present Parliament of Iceland was established in 930, and spans a greater history than that of any other legislative body in the world to-day. So, evidently, the celebration is the commemoration of a most unusual and important historical event, in which all the civilized world is interested and particularly the students of representative government and all people who enjoy the blessings thereof.

I will submit here this afternoon not my own views with reference to the importance of a matter of this sort, but rather the views of a typical, eminent student and historian. Let me quote from a lecture delivered by the Hon. James Bryce, which will be found in the chapter on primitive Iceland in the compilation of lectures entitled "Studies in History and Jurisprudence." There Mr. Bryce said:

Iceland is known to most men as a land of volcanoes, geysers, and glaciers. But it ought to be no less interesting to the student of history as the birthplace of a brilliant literature in poetry and prose, and as the home of a people who have maintained for many centuries a high level of intellectual cultivation. It is an almost unique instance of a community whose culture and creative power flourished independently of any favoring material conditions, and, indeed, under conditions in the highest degree unfavorable. Nor ought it to be less interesting to the student of politics and laws as having produced a constitution unlike any other whereof records remain, and a body of law so elaborate and complex that it is hard to believe that it existed among men whose chief occupation was to kill one another.

After describing the early history of Iceland, including the settlement thereof by the Norse vikings, Mr. Bryce describes the spot known as Thingvellir, the place where the 1930 celebration will be held, and continues:

Here, accordingly, Ulfljot having in the meantime returned from Norway with his materials for legislation, the first Althing, or General Assembly of all Iceland met in A. D. 930, and here it continued to meet year after year for a fortnight in the latter half of June until the year 1800, one of the oldest national assemblies in the civilized world and one of the very few which did not, like the English Parliament and the Diet of the Romano-Germanic Empire, grow up imperceptibly and, so to speak, naturally, from small beginnings, but was formally and of set purpose established by what would have been called, had paper existed, a paper constitution; that is to say, by the deliberate agreement of independent groups of men seeking to attain the common ends of order and justice.

It will be borne in mind that this chapter was originally prepared by Mr. Bryce as a lecture before the reestablishment of the Althing as the governing assembly of Iceland. When the publication was authorized in 1901, Mr. Bryce added a note to the matter above quoted as follows:

Since this lecture was delivered the Althing which since 1843 had led a feeble life at Reykjavik as a sort of advisory council, has been reestablished as a representative governing assembly under a new constitution granted to Iceland in 1874. It now meets every second year at Reykjavik.

Mr. Bryce closes his essay on primitive Iceland with the following eulogy to this small, remarkable country:

And it is beyond doubt chiefly owing to the profusion and the literary splendor of these works of a remote antiquity—works produced in an age when England and Germany, Italy and France had nothing better than dull monkish annalists or the reciters of such a tedious ballad epic as the Song of the Nibelungs—that the Icelandic language has preserved its ancient strength and purity and that the Icelandic nation, a handful of people scattered round the edge of a vast and dreary wilderness, has maintained itself, in face of the overwhelming forces of nature, at so high a level of culture, virtue, and intelligence.

Enough has been said to indicate the importance of the event that is to be commemorated. It naturally follows that the United States should and must be interested therein. This Nation could not afford not to accept the invitation even though there were no specific ties between them.

When we realize, however, how the history of Iceland is interwoven with that of our own country, we find added reasons for participation, and I submit excellent reasons for doing more than is ordinarily done in accepting invitations from other countries to participate in the commemoration of some historic event of especial importance to such foreign country.

First of all, we find that the first white man who set foot on American soil was a native son of Iceland, Leif Ericsson. There is no longer any dispute as to the discovery of America by the Norsemen. Such discovery is accepted as a historic fact by all authorities.

It seems entirely unnecessary to cite specific proofs thereof. It is, however, interesting to note that President Coolidge in an address delivered on June 8, 1925, in his capacity as Chief Executive of this Nation, before the so-called Norwegian centennial celebration at the Minnesota State Fair Grounds, in unequivocal language recognized such discovery. Let me quote the following interesting excerpts from that well-prepared address:

But even before William of Normandy had conquered at Hastings, Leif, the son of Eric, near 500 years before Columbus, appears to have found the New World. Indeed, there seems little doubt that several centuries before Columbus saw the light of day there was born upon American soil, of Norse parents, a boy who afterwards became so great a mathematician and astronomer that his studies may have contributed much to the fund of knowledge which helped Columbus formulate his vision of the world as we know it. Among the fascinating chapters in the history of the Dark Ages is the story of Iceland. As a little Norse Republic it maintained itself for several centuries as one of the real repositories of ancient culture in a world whose lamp of learning seemed near to flickering out. We have long known of the noble Icelandic literature which was produced during those generations of the intellectual twilight; but we know too little of the part which Iceland performed as an outpost of the sturdy northern culture in bridging over the gulf of darkness between the ancient and modern eras of history.

These sons of Thor and Odin and the great free north shape themselves in the mind's eye as very princes of high and hardy adventure. From Norway to Iceland, from Iceland to Greenland, from Greenland to the mainland—step by step they worked their way across the North Atlantic.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTNESS. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that historians of considerable repute in the world attribute the discovery of America in the sixth century to the Irish?

Mr. BURTNESS. I have not heard of it. But I will say that if substantial evidence is submitted that they did discover it, we certainly ought to give them very great credit for so doing.

This resolution is simply a recognition of an honor due to that country which all historians now concede gave birth to that intrepid sailor and viking adventurer who did discover America in the year 1000. Certainly that does not detract from any of the honor that this country owes and readily yields to anyone else, including the rediscovery of America in 1492 by the fearless sailor from Genoa, Christopher Columbus.

Mr. GREEN. Under the auspices of a great Spanish Government.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. And the gentleman will say that at least we have tangible, living historical record of the discovery of Columbus.

Mr. BURTNESS. And we have likewise ample historical records of the discovery of this country by Leif Ericsson, as to which I am sure the gentleman and my friend agree.

Mr. Speaker and Members, I have been very much pleased with the fine editorial comment which has been given to this resolution since it was introduced, a comment has been spontaneous and without any propaganda or anything of that sort. I have here a reprint of an editorial in the New York Evening Post, which I shall not take the time to read, but which with others I may append by way of extension if granted. In this morning's issue of the New York Times I find an editorial headed Iceland's Millennial, which is so appropriate in view of the fact that the eyes of the world are now directed to the country of Iceland because of the air flight to that country by the Swedish flyers and who will continue on therefrom, that I shall read it:

ICELAND'S MILLENNIAL

While the eyes of the west are turned toward Iceland, in the hope that the Swedish flyers may be able to continue in their course, Iceland's entire population of 100,000 is by their visit only for the moment diverted from thoughts of the celebration next year of the thousandth anniversary of the establishment of its parliament. It was in the year 930 A. D. that the "Althing," its legislative assembly, was organized. Though its powers have been subject to change, it has been the continuous existence for these thousand years and has recently come into virtually complete autonomy, subject with Denmark to the same King.

A joint resolution has been introduced in Congress by Representative BURTNESS, of North Dakota, authorizing the President of the United States to accept the invitation of the Government of Iceland to participate in the celebration. The resolution provides that a special delegation of five official representatives of the American people shall be sent on this special mission. The preamble recites that the history of this intrepid little people is interwoven with our own through the scholarly influence of its literature and through the contribution to our prosperity and culture of a goodly number of descendants of Iceland in America—40,000 descendants in Canada and the United States, it is estimated. Moreover, the persistence of a legislative body through so many centuries deserves recognition by other peoples that have themselves made successful use of a parliamentary system, and especially by our own country, to which Iceland is a near neighbor, no farther away than San Francisco is from New York.

Another reason is offered. It was a native son of Iceland, Leif Ericsson, son of Eric the Red, who in the year 100 "discovered the American mainland." The location of Vinland is not definitely established. And Leif Ericsson may not, as a recent American poet has put it, "Have come rowing up the Charles River in the sea-battered dragon ships." But somewhere on the mainland he did doubtless land, and the genealogy of many living is traced back to the child of Thorfin Karlsefne, the first white child, so far as known, born on this continent. It is proposed that a "suitable statue" of Leif Ericsson shall be presented as a gift of the American people to the people of Iceland in connection with the celebration. We should at any rate be represented there as a Nation, and if the Government does not go so far as to send the statue of Leif, private funds should provide this monument to him, of whose exploit it has been said:

"Not till Leif's sons set foot upon the moon
Will such a deed as his be done again."

Immigrants from Iceland and their descendants have in more recent times contributed much to our Nation. They are found in substantial settlements in the Northwestern States. Most of them are farmers of a high degree of intelligence, thrifty and capable, tremendously interested in education, and constituting one of the finest elements in our American citizenship. Many are well-known professional men—educators, lawyers, judges, doctors, and clergymen. A substantial number are found in our larger cities devoting their time to literature, painting, sculpture, and other arts. A few have made pronounced success in commercial pursuits. As typical of the adventurous spirit, the intelligence, the energy, and the thorough preparation of the old vikings, I might mention the world-renowned Icelandic-American, Vilhjalmur Stefansson.

Much could appropriately be said at this time with reference to the contribution of the Norse people generally, not only to this country but to England as well. Lack of time forbids so doing, but I might say that the coveted right possessed by Americans and by the people in almost all free governments of the right of trial by jury originated, as far as my investigation discloses, with the Norse people. Everyone on the floor this afternoon knows that it was through the influence of the Normans and other settlers of Norse blood in England that the right of trial by jury was granted to the people of that great country, but long before that time the jury system had been in force and effect in the little country of Iceland. Is it, therefore, remarkable that the Hon. James Bryce paid the liberty-loving people of that little nation such a wonderful tribute as that which I read to you a few moments ago?

Have I not made out my case in favor of this resolution? Is not the cause and success of representative government wherever same is found in the world worthy of recognition by the greatest Republic on the face of the earth? Is not the discoverer of America worthy of having a suitable memorial built for him in his native land out of the Treasury of the United States?

I hope soon to get an opportunity to call up this resolution for action on the floor, and I bespeak for it favorable consideration at your hands. You would honor America more by such action than you would honor Iceland.

By way of extension granted me I include herewith a couple of editorials and other documents. The first is an editorial from the May 31, 1929, issue of the New York Evening Post, and is as follows:

AMERICA AND ICELAND

One matter upon which Senate and House should find no difficulty in agreeing is the joint resolution authorizing the President to accept the invitation of the Kingdom of Iceland to participate in the celebration next year of the one thousandth anniversary of the founding of the Icelandic Legislative Assembly, the Althing, and as signalizing our interest in this occasion to present to the people of Iceland a statue of Leif Ericsson, discoverer of the American mainland in the year 1000. This would be a graceful and impressive international act. In 1874 our American poet, Bayard Taylor, went to the millennial celebration of the discovery of Iceland as representative of the New York Tribune. As he approached the shores of that country he was inspired to write a poem of greeting which he entitled "America to Iceland" and which will doubtless be frequently reprinted and recited in connection with next year's celebration. The poem is as follows:

We come, the children of thy Vinland,
The youngest of the world's high peers,
O land of steel and song and saga,
To greet thy glorious thousand years.

Across the sea the son of Eric
Dared with his venturous dragon's prow;
From shores where Thorfinn set thy banner,
Thy latest children seek thee now.

Hail, motherland of skalds and heroes,
By love of freedom hither hurled,
Fire in their hearts, as in thy mountains,
And strength like thine to shake the world.

When war and ravage wrecked the nations,
The bird of song made thee her home;
The ancient gods, the ancient glory,
Still dwelt within thy shores of foam.

Here as a fount may keep its virtue,
While all the rivers turbid run,
The manly growth of deed and daring
Was thine, beneath a scantier sun.

Set far apart, neglected, exiled,
Thy children wrote their runes of pride,
With power that brings in this, thy triumph,
The conquering nations to thy side.

What though thy native harps be silent,
The chord they struck shall ours prolong,
We claim thee kindred, call thee mother,
O land of saga, steel, and song.

The next is an editorial published in April by the Grand Forks Herald, a daily newspaper published at Grand Forks, N. Dak. It is as follows:

HONORING A PEOPLE

It was appropriate that the resolution authorizing the President to accept the invitation to be represented at the thousandth anniversary celebration of Icelandic government should come from a North Dakotan. One of the oldest and largest settlements of Icelanders on the continent is in the North Dakota district represented by Congressman BURTNESS, and that settlement has given to the State and to the Nation some of their distinguished citizens. In the resolution covering the subject, Mr. BURTNESS paid high and deserved tribute to the character of these people and to the history of the land from which they are derived.

It is due very largely, of course, to its isolated position that Iceland has preserved down through the centuries its purity of race, language, and culture. But isolation has its dangers. Seldom in the course of history has a small group, cut off from communication with the rest of the world, escaped deterioration. Habits have become fixed, minds have become closed, and little by little there has been a slipping backward until what there was of real civilization has been lost.

It has not been so with the people of Iceland. It is true that they were not separated entirely from the rest of the world, for their hardy and enterprising men braved the dangers of the deep, carried on commerce with the lands which their forefathers had left, and, with Leif Ericsson, explored lands unknown to the civilized world of that day. Yet there was isolation. The little country was far off the usual road of travel, and in the main the people who inhabited it spent their lives there. From some source they had brought with them elements of character which made their history different from that of other peoples somewhat similarly situated. They had within themselves the elements which made for wholesome living and constructive thinking. When the first representative government was established in Iceland, Alfred the Great of England had only recently been gathered to his fathers. In the millennium that has passed England has experienced several revolutions, has suffered from numerous civil wars, and has passed through numerous constitutional changes. During the same long period Iceland has maintained intact its own system of government, making such changes as seemed wise from time to time, but always in a regular and orderly manner. Her people have been given the advantages of education, and her scholars and writers have kept pace with the thinking of the world and with its achievements in literature. There has been no deterioration, but rather continuous and orderly progress, and the little nation which is soon to celebrate its thousandth anniversary may well be proud of the achievements of 10 centuries of history.

I also include the report made on my resolution by the Secretary of State in response to a request for a report thereon by the Hon. STEPHEN G. PORTER, chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs. That report is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
May 29, 1929.

The Hon. STEPHEN G. PORTER,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. PORTER: In reply to your letter of May 13 requesting a report on House Joint Resolution 2, introduced by Representative BURTNESS, to authorize the President to appoint representatives to the one thousandth anniversary of the Althing and to present to the people of Iceland a statue of Leif Ericsson, I have pleasure in informing you that upon February 23 last the department received from the presidents of the Legislative Assembly of the Kingdom of Iceland an invitation to the Government of the United States to send special representatives to take part in this anniversary, which will be held about the end of June, 1930.

On March 8 the department in a note to the minister of Denmark requested that through his kind intermediary the presidents of the Legislative Assembly of the Kingdom of Iceland be informed that this Government deeply appreciated this courteous invitation, but sincerely regretted that it would be unable to accept it.

While the Department of State is not in a position to recommend favorable action upon the proposed resolution, it has no objection to the measure, if for any reason Congress should think it wise favorably to accept it.

I am, my dear Mr. PORTER, very sincerely yours,

H. L. STIMSON.

PULASKI CELEBRATION

The SPEAKER. The Chair is now prepared to recognize the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW], and following him the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURTNESS].

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 50.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate Joint Resolution 50

Joint resolution to provide for the observance of the one hundredth and fiftieth anniversary of the death of Brig. Gen. Casimir Pulaski

Whereas October 11, 1779, marks, in American history, the date of the heroic death of Brig. Gen. Casimir Pulaski, who died from wounds recieved on October 9, 1779, at the siege of Savannah, Ga.; and

Whereas the States of Indiana, Wisconsin, Michigan, Ohio, South Carolina, Pennsylvania, New York, Minnesota, Maryland, New Jersey, Illinois, and other States of the Union have, by legislative enactment, designated October 11, 1929, to be "General Pulaski's Memorial Day"; and

Whereas October 11, 1929, marks the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the death of General Pulaski, and it is but fitting that such date should be observed and commemorated with suitable patriotic exercises: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States is requested, by proclamation, (1) to invite the people of the United States to observe October 11, 1929, as the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the death of Brig. Gen. Casimir Pulaski, Revolutionary War hero, by holding such exercises and ceremonies in schools, churches, or other suitable places as may be deemed appropriate in commemoration of the death of General Pulaski, and (2) to provide for the appropriate display of the flag of the United States upon all governmental buildings in the United States on such date.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, it is to me a source of gratification that the first measure which it is my fortune to pilot through the Congress of the United States tenders the homage of a grateful country to one of the most dashing and engaging personalities the world has ever known, a zealous friend of humanity whose restless and unconquerable spirit played a superhero's part on war's great stage when the greatest nation of all time was being born in the travail of revolution, and heroes were the common mold of men.

No feeble tribute of mine could add to the laurels that history has placed on the brow of Gen. Casimir Pulaski. I shall therefore content myself with a simple statement of the gladness it affords me to be the author of a measure upon which the Congress this day has placed the stamp of its approval and which now goes to the President, requesting him to proclaim October 11 next as Pulaski sesquicentennial memorial day and to invite all of the people under our flag to assemble in convenient places on that day, and by such ceremonies as they may devise pay their tributes of reverence to the great son of Poland who loved us so much that he crossed the seas to fight for us, whose loyalty ended only when he gave his life that America might be free.

In the world's solemn history Casimir Pulaski stands out like a mountain peak as a protagonist of human freedom. He was born in one of the blackest periods of Poland's tragic subjugation, when his compatriots were crushed by a cruel conspiracy against the rights of man, a league of infamy between the strong to crush the weak. Never was there a more pathetic picture of selfishness, rapacity, and violence than Poland presented when Pulaski was a youth. He became the articulate voice of a mercilessly oppressed but unsubdued people. That voice rang through Poland; it rang through Europe; it reached the throne of Russia and the answer from the throne was "Death to liberty!"

The star of freedom in Poland had set. With infinite sadness in his heart and the gibbet staring him in the face, Pulaski made his way to Turkey and thence to Paris, where he learned that in America a new field was opening where he might unsheath his sword for the same rights of mankind, the same immutable laws of justice for which he had fought in his own Poland.

I am not going to retrace now the record of General Pulaski's glorious achievements in behalf of America. From the time he gave his hand and his heart to General Washington until death claimed him at the siege of Savannah, only a little over two years later, he wrought gloriously. Unable to speak a word of English when he pledged his loyalty to Washington as a volunteer, he soon proved himself a genius of cavalry, and at Brandywine, at Germantown, and a score of other battle fields he laughed at death and wrote his name among the immortals. In the affections of posterity he has an abiding place. Around the firesides and in the vast, crowded halls of the future, wherever worth is recognized and genius is extolled, his achievements will be recalled with pride by countless generations yet unborn. On October 11 it will be 150 years since he gave the last full measure of devotion and his body was committed to the sea, but the glory of his services to mankind does not dim with age, and no doubt citizens everywhere will rally to the President's proclamation to honor him, for certainly he won his title to the Nation's grateful remembrance.

THE ONE THOUSANDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE ALTHING, IN ICELAND

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House Joint Resolution 2.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Joint Resolution 2

Joint resolution to authorize the President to accept the invitation of the Kingdom of Iceland to participate in the celebration of the one thousandth anniversary of the Althing and in connection therewith to present to the people of Iceland a statue of Leif Ericson

Whereas Iceland, that most remarkable saga land of Europe, a sovereign State in a union with Denmark, will celebrate in 1930 the one thousandth anniversary of the establishment of its legislative body, and has invited the United States to participate therein; and

Whereas the present Parliament of Iceland, the Althing, was established in 930 on the famous "Thingvellir," not far from the present capital, and as a parliamentary body has a history spanning a greater number of centuries than that of any existing nation, and as such is an inspiration to all democratic governments; and

Whereas the first white man to set foot on American soil was a native son of Iceland, Leif Ericson (the son of Eric the Red, a Norwegian who had settled in Iceland), an able and fearless sailor, who in 985 accompanied his father to Greenland, and thereafter went thence on a cruise to Norway, and on the return trip in the year 1000 discovered the American mainland, which feat constitutes the beginning of authentic American history; and

Whereas the history of this intrepid little nation is otherwise in many ways interwoven with that of our own country through the scholarly influence of its remarkable literature, and particularly by the settlement in the great Northwest of a goodly number of thrifty, hard-working, and intelligent people from Iceland who with their descendants not only constitute a noteworthy fraction of our best citizens but have also contributed much to the prosperity, the education, and scientific knowledge, the business acumen, the arts, and the culture of our Nation: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to accept the invitation of the Presidents of the Legislative Assembly of the Kingdom of Iceland (the Althing) to the Government of the United States of America to appoint official representatives of the American people to the celebration of the one thousandth anniversary of the Althing, the National Parliament of Iceland, by appointing and sending five special representatives to take part in this celebration on behalf of the Government of the United States of America; and the President be, and he is hereby, further authorized and requested to procure a suitable statue of Leif Ericson and present the same as a gift of the American people to the people of Iceland in connection with the American participation in such celebration.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of defraying the expense of participation by the Government of the United States in the said celebration as aforesaid an appropriation of such sum as may be necessary is hereby authorized to include transportation, subsistence, or per diem in lieu of subsistence (notwithstanding the provisions of any previous act), sculptors' fees, and such other expenses as the President shall deem appropriate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURTNESS] whether or not he will consent to strike out his whereas clauses, because I do not believe that the House of Representatives by unanimous consent ought to attempt to write history? We may have differences of opinion as to certain historical facts and there is no use to inject the issue in this discussion. We all agree on the desirability of participating in the anniversary of the establishment in Iceland of the first parliamentary government of the world, and we all have the greatest admiration and love and affection for the people of Iceland. We should not mar the occasion by injecting something that is controversial, and by an attempt to place the American Congress on record on a much-mooted question. I think the gentleman can achieve his purpose with the adoption of the resolution and follow the well-established custom of the House by striking out the preamble and the whereas clauses.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that in drawing this resolution I drew it very carefully, so that if it were found advisable for the preamble to be stricken out it might be stricken out and the resolution itself would still be legislatively complete.

It is true the preamble is not necessary, so far as a legislative act is concerned. However, I have this in mind: This is a resolution which, if agreed to, is passed in a way to honor another country, and what we say in this preamble, or what I have tried to say in the preamble, shows some of the reasons why we are particularly interested in participating in the celebration. It refers to the contributions which this country has received from Iceland not only because of the fact that a native son of that country first set his foot upon this continent but also by way of recognition of citizenship of that country who have come to our shores and who have made splendid American citizens and contributed much to our Nation in many ways. In view of the fact that the enactment of this resolution would be an international act indicating good will and friendship, I was in hopes that Congress would depart from the usual legislative rule and permit the preamble to stay in. I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PORTER], that a preamble has been quite customary in the case of resolutions dealing with international matters.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BURTNESS. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. How much does the gentleman estimate it will cost to build the statue proposed?

Mr. BURTNESS. My best information is that it will not cost more than $50,000. That is the information given to me by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE]. That is about the price usually paid for statues which have come under the jurisdiction of his committee.

Mr. SNELL. What would be the expense of participating in this celebration?

Mr. BURTNESS. Only a few thousand dollars.

Mr. SNELL. We have been appropriating much more than that this morning for an international radio conference.

Mr. BURTNESS. The expense would be only for five delegates, who would serve without pay; just the expense of sending them.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. You would want to send them in proper style. You would not want to send them over in the steerage.

Mr. BURTNESS. Certainly; but I do not think it necessary to send the United States Army or Navy or a large retinue of attachés over there.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I hope the gentleman will agree to my suggestion to strike out the preamble. He accomplishes his purpose in the resolution without the preamble. Why start something?

Mr. BURTNESS. Of course, under the situation existing in the special session, I realize that we can do this only by unanimous consent, and that I must yield to any serious objection that the gentleman makes. I only take the position that the gentleman should not insist on his stand. The preamble is only explanatory and hurts no one. I stated frankly to the House that the legislation proposed would still be complete without the preamble——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And carry out the purpose the gentleman has in mind, to which we all have agreed.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTNESS. Yes; certainly.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Louisiana. I did not intend, in propounding the question I did to the gentleman from North Dakota, to question the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus, to whom the credit is given by most of the historians of the world, but merely to suggest, as Napoleon said on one occasion, that history is a fable agreed upon, and there are many accounts of the discovery of America, and in one of them credit is given to the Irish for the first discovery of America. That historical or traditional voyage was made by St. Brendan, who was, in accordance with Irish song and story, accompanied by a number of Irish heroes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I insist on striking out the preamble.

Mr. BURTNESS. I will therefore yield to the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] and, if consent is given for consideration, will not object to striking out the preamble.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTNESS. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman assure Congress that he will not come back later and ask for an appropriation in excess of $3,000?

Mr. BURTNESS. The amount to be expended is a matter that can be properly safeguarded and taken care of by the Appropriations Committee when they get the exact estimates as to what the cost of the statue and the expenses of delegates will be.

Mr. GARNER. I do not want to object to the gentleman's resolution. The only objection I can see to it now is as to what it is going to cost the Government. The gentleman ought to be able to say and assure the House that he will not come back for a greater sum. The gentleman has said it would cost three or four thousand dollars.

Mr. BURTNESS. Oh, no; that was for the expenses of the delegates. I said $50,000 for the statue, which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] tells me seems to be the usual cost of a statue worth while.

Mr. GARNER. In other words, this resolution will cost $54,000?

Mr. BURTNESS. Yes; approximately that.

Mr. GARNER. At least?

Mr. BURTNESS. Yes; that is my best estimate on available information.

Mr. GARNER. I would like to know what the gentleman from Connecticut thinks about this resolution.

Mr. TILSON. I think it ought to be passed. I think this is one of those handsome things we ought to agree to.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, to what committee would this bill originally go?

Mr. BURTNESS. To the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and if I had had the time in my discussion this afternoon I would have advised the membership of the House that all the members of that committee with whom I have been able to talk, including the chairman of the committee, several of the ranking Members on the Republican side, and including also the ranking Member on the Democratic side, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM], as well as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE], are heartily in favor of the passage of this resolution. Both of these men authorized me to say to the Speaker and to the Members of the House that they believe the resolution should be passed. I have also letters in my files, or copies of letters, from most of the members of the committee indicating approval of the resolution.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Would the gentleman be willing to provide that this statue should be the work of an American artist?

Mr. BURTNESS. I am glad the gentleman from New York asked that question. I have agreed with the gentleman from New York upon the general proposition that ordinarily anything of this sort that is to be paid for out of the Federal Treasury should be done by an American artist.

If the statue were to be placed within the United States certainly I would so contend in this case. However, I hesitate to adopt the suggestion in this particular case for one reason, and for one reason alone, and that is the fact that perhaps the world's outstanding sculptor lives in Reikjavik, Iceland, Mr. Einar Jonsson. In view of Mr. Jonsson's high standing I am inclined to think that the State Department or the President ought to be given the privilege of taking into consideration the question as to whether the statue should be constructed by Einar Jonsson, living in Iceland, the place where the statue is to be placed, or whether it should be constructed by an American sculptor. Certainly if it is not constructed by Einar Jonsson I would be very much disappointed if it were not constructed by some American making his living and earning his livelihood within the United States.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am convinced that if it is constructed by Einar Jonsson all the artists in this country will be satisfied. There is no question about that, but the trouble is we have some of these perambulating artists who go around to afternoon teas and get commissions away from real American artists and sculptors of merit and repute.

Mr. BURTNESS. The responsibility under this resolution is placed upon the President of the United States, and I do not believe the President, with the advice of the State Department, is going to commission some perambulator to do the work. I would hesitate to eliminate Mr. Jonsson from consideration. I believe we can safely leave it as the resolution stands, particularly with this explanation in the RECORD.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, under the reservation of the right to object, I wish to direct inquiry as to the appropriateness of presenting any statue in connection with this celebration. Do I understand that the gentleman from North Dakota has made an investigation and ascertained that in their capital they have no statue of Leif Ericsson?

Mr. BURTNESS. That is my understanding, but my investigation has not been so complete that I would want the House to rely upon it.

Mr. STAFFORD. If they do have a statue would it not be considered out of place for the American Government to present another? Milwaukee, through the descendants of Norwegian ancestry, and I know of many other large cities, has a statue of Leif Ericsson, commanding a prominent site overlooking the lake. I am in sympathy with the idea that our Congress should recognize this celebration, but are we not proceeding rather precipitately? Suppose the Republic or Kingdom of Iceland—it is a kingdom, I believe?

Mr. BURTNESS. It operates under a joint king.

Mr. STAFFORD. Suppose the Kingdom of Iceland already had a statue of that great and intrepid, as the gentleman says, Norwegian explorer, would it not be out of place for our Government to erect another statue? I think we should have some investigation made of that matter before we offer a token of our regard for the Kingdom of Iceland, limited to a statue.

Mr. BURTNESS. I may say to the gentleman that Icelandic Americans who have traveled back and forth between Iceland and this country and with whom this thought originated have not indicated at any time to me—and I have talked with several of them on various occasions—the presence of any statue of Leif Ericsson in Reykjavik, but it may be advisable to add after the word "statue" the words "or memorial," so that if there should be what you might call an ordinary statue there now our Government could give consideration to the question of whether the memorial should take some other form, although I do know that the people in this country who are interested in the matter prefer above all other things a statue that would typify their concept of the individual, Leif Ericsson.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. There would not be any conflict if there were another statue there now.

Mr. BURTNESS. Not at all, but the other might under such circumstances be fully as appropriate. I mean some other suitable form of memorial.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would the gentleman be willing in that connection to place a limit of cost of, say, $100,000?

Mr. BURTNESS. I have no objection to that whatever.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think there should certainly be some limit of cost.

Mr. GREEN. Why make it $100,000? The gentleman has said that it would cost $54,000 or $55,000. If we make it at $100,000, they will spend that amount.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no.

Mr. BURTNESS. Suppose we say $55,000; I believe that should prove sufficient and would also make something definite for the Appropriations Committee to act on at once.

Mr. STAFFORD. With that understanding, I shall have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Dakota?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, with the understanding I have with the gentleman from North Dakota that he will consent to the striking out of the "whereases," I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment: In line 4, page 3, after the word "statute," insert "or other memorial," so that it will read "procure a suitable statue or other memorial."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 3, line 4, after the word "statue," insert "or other memorial."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then as a further amendment, after the word "Ericson," in line 4, page 3, insert "at a limit of cost not to exceed $50,000."

Mr. BURTNESS. If I may have the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin, would he not accomplish his purpose by proposing an amendment of the words "not exceeding $55,000" in line 10, following the word "necessary"? The gentleman will note that section 2 covers all sculptors' fees and the expenses of participation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Following the suggestion of the gentleman from North Dakota, I will withdraw the last amendment and offer it after the word "necessary."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 4, line 10, after the word "necessary" insert the "at a cost not exceeding $55,000."

Mr. BURTNESS. May I say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that the amendment should be "not exceeding $55,000," because it is the appropriation we are dealing with and not the cost.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment and modify it to read "not exceeding $55,000."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 4, line 10, after the word "necessary," insert the words "not exceeding $55,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the spelling of "Ericson" may be corrected. I believe the proper spelling is "Ericsson," although it is spelled differently in a great many publications.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out all the whereas clauses.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was read a third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. BURTNESS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

HON. HERBERT J. DRANE

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes to make an announcement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker and fellow Members, I have a brief announcement that I believe the House will take pleasure in sharing with me. It is an announcement affecting my distinguished colleague the Hon. HERBERT JACKSON DRANE, of the State of Florida.

Congressman DRANE moved to our State while yet a young man and, like many other of our citizens born in other States, is one in whom we are well pleased and justly proud. He is not a college man, but is a practical engineer, one of the greatest engineers our State has ever had; also a business man of acumen and marked success; mayor of his city, member of the finance board of Polk County, member of the Florida Legislature in both Houses, and presiding officer of the Florida Senate, as well as 14 years of unselfish and exemplary service in this great body. He is a man of retiring modesty but of profound wisdom and that deep sense of honor which unselfishly and effectively serves his fellow man. An honor has been conferred upon him which very often goes to members of the bar, most distinguished judges, to those who have excelled in the educational world, but seldom—yes; rarely—to those in other walks of life. He has received an honorary degree in the appreciation and recognition of his unselfish, full, and patriotic services to his fellow man and to his country. [Applause.]

Southern College, one of the best small colleges in the world, located in Lakeland, Fla., has just recently conferred the honorary degree of doctor of laws upon my able and distinguished Florida colleague the Hon. HERBERT JACKSON DRANE. [Much applause.]

FLOOD CONTROL

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. GLOVER. And I ask unanimous consent to incorporate a letter I have received from the county judge.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I ask your attention for a short time this morning to study with you and discuss the great question of flood control on the Mississippi River and its tributaries, which is one of the greatest questions that is now before the people of the United States.

You who have been serving here in Congress for some time are familiar with the legislation that has been passed by Congress toward the solution of this question.

The first bill passed was one declaring it to be the policy of the United States Government to establish a permanent flood-control system for this great river and its tributaries. This act was not specific in this: That it did not go into details as to how the work should be performed, but is more in the nature of declarations of a policy on the part of the Government.

We then had passed another bill, which provided for the appointment of three engineers to make a survey and to report their investigations back to the President, and the plan adopted by the President was to become the flood-control plan to be carried out by this Government.

That survey was made by General Jadwin and his two assistants; his report was made back to the President of the United States during President Coolidge's administration, and was in part adopted by the President, but not in full, as I understand it.

The plan outlined in the Jadwin report south of Arkansas City, Ark., on the Mjssissippi, and between that point and the Ouachita and Red Rivers, is the territory in this flood control that I desire to call your attention to especially.

The plan proposed—and which has not yet been adopted, as I understand—is to construct what they have termed a spillway and a fuse-plug levee above it so that when the river reaches a certain point—we will say at Arkansas City—this fuse-plug levee would wash out and cause the water to be turned down through a section of very rich and fertile country and be overflowed and destroyed in value.

The plan contemplates the construction of a levee from near Dumas in Desha County, Ark., parallel with the Missouri Pacific Railroad until it reaches the Ouachita River, and also the construction of another levee leaving the main levee on the Mississippi at a point opposite Greenville, Miss., and on the Arkansas side and extending by way of Lake Village to Eudora, and from Eudora back to the main levee of the Mississippi and leaving this vast territory, comprising the most of Desha and Chicot Counties in Arkansas, in what is known as the spillway for all of the flood waters accumulated above the levee and in case of an excessive overflow of the river would flow through the spillway and cause great damage.

They are also contemplating another levee from this levee that parallels the Missouri Pacific Railroad beginning at a point just north of McGehee and intersecting the main levee on the Mississippi a few miles above this point. When the Mississippi River at Arkansas City reaches a height of 60 feet and a fraction this fuse-plug levee will wash out and cause all of the territory below this, composed of many thousand acres of valuable land in cultivation now, to be overflowed and the waters rushed over them through this spillway.

Just why it is contemplated by this plan to take and destroy such a vast territory which is included in this spillway is absolutely incomprehensible.

The publication of this plan by the engineers and The Adjutant General for building it has caused a great deal of damage to the lands situated below this fuse-plug levee. The lands affected by the spillway have been damaged now in price until there is no sale whatever for the lands. No one wants to purchase valuable lands under the conditions that this would place those lands in when this plan was carried out. One had as well lay out a city establishing a leper colony in the center of it and ask people to buy as to ask them to purchase lands under the conditions these lands will be placed in. If a dynamite plant was established near your premises, you can imagine how it would affect the sale of the property.

I am informed that the National Government has refused to make any farm loans on lands affected by this spillway or to be affected by it. The agitation of this plan whether carried out or not has been a great damage to property in this section.

The National Government in the past laid out what it classed as a standard levee that it claimed would always protect those lands. Before the standard levee, as proposed by the engineers of the War Department, was built, it was necessary that the owners take care of the storm waters that found their natural outlet in Desha County through Cypress Creek drainage system, which system appears to have been formed by natural causes many years before any levee construction had been undertaken.

About the year 1910 this survey was undertaken by the Department of Agriculture, and soon after the completion of the survey a bill was introduced in the Arkansas Legislature creating the Cypress Creek drainage district, which the preamble to that bill recited that the drainage district is being constructed for the purpose of closing the Cypress Creek gap, thereby making it possible for the Government to build its standard levee.

The property owners were told, and it was understood by all the property owners, that the standard levee anticipated the highest possible stage that could exist and that we would have a territory forever protected from the ravages of the Mississippi River.

This Cypress Creek drainage project was financed, so far as the survey was concerned, by the Department of Agriculture, and the act creating the district provided that the levee district might use its funds in assisting in this project. In other words, both the levee and drainage acts anticipated a levee system and not a drainage system.

In order that these storm waters might be carried on through this artificial outlet the people of Chicot County formed a similar project, taxing their lands, under the project which was to protect themselves from the Mississippi River. It will be noted that the legislature from time to time found by legislative declarations that these lands would be greatly enhanced in value and thus authorizing the expenditure.

If these guide and controlling levees in case of high overflow should break after being constructed, then the very portion of the county that they proposed to protect would have the waters piled to the height of the guide levee, which would leave such towns as McGehee and Dermont in Arkansas, and Montrose in Louisiana, in a thousand times worse position than Arkansas City was during the 1927 flood, because they will not only be subjected to a great depth of water but also to a very dangerous current.

These lands were taxed first to build a levee, which levee was constructed to aid navigation principally and agriculture indirectly, the Government putting up $2 to aid navigation, the property owners putting up $1 to aid agriculture. In addition, the property owners have put up a very heavy drainage tax in order to help the levee, which levee was intended to assist the economic conditions of the vicinity served by the levee.

Desha County has approximately 480 sections of land lying in what has heretofore been known as the protected area—that is, on the land side of the controlled levee. This 480 sections of land have approximately 310,000 acres, which 310,000 acres is bonded for more than $30 per acre, when all the bonded indebtedness has been taken into consideration and the accumulated interest necessary to redeem these bonds. When the spillway shall have been completed Desha County will then have 75 sections of land protected, which area will have approximately 48,000 acres. This 48,000 acres will be compelled to produce the economic wealth of the entire county. I take it that the situation will be equally as bad, or worse, in Chicot County.

Here we find a situation that will be required to surrender in one county over 250,000 acres of land that has cost the landowners in excess of $30 per acre, not counting the special levee and drainage taxes. The property holders owned this property for what it would produce as well as the special value that might flow from it. If this plan is carried out, the Government will willfully destroy a levee system that it held out through its engineers and acts to the property owner at the time he was bonding his lands as a standard levee.

The property owners built a drainage project that was laid out by the Department of Agriculture in the year 1912, at which time the report said that the Cypress Creek drainage district in Desha and Chicot Counties was the most comprehensive of its kind in the United States.

By an act of Congress this levee district has been destroyed. This drainage district likewise has been destroyed. I do not mean it has been destroyed so far as actually turning the water in on it, but it has been destroyed or depreciated by reason of engineers, workmen, experts, and various other people in the employ of the Government having resided in these counties for the past two years, and by their acts made preparation for the flood that they, in turn, say may never occur.

Prior to the time of laying out of this plan, the landowners in this section had some credit and could borrow money on their property and pay their taxes on these lands. Now you can not borrow on the lands, because of the fact that they are placed in this spillway.

The various individuals owning lands in this section have not been able to pay these special improvement taxes, and the property owner can not improve his lands that are wild, nor can he make permanent improvement on the lands that were cleared before the spillway act. Therefore it will be seen that there has been an actual taking of the physical property if this plan is carried out.

The forfeitures that are working against the property owners are repeatedly taking away from him his chances of owning this property very long. The threat of the spillway has destroyed all possible barter and sale, and these lands can not be mortgaged or hypothecated for anything.

In other words, the United States Government, by the threat of taking these lands without compensation has put the property owner in such shape that in a very short time the statute of limitations, where the property has forfeited to the State, or various local improvements, will take away the property owner's chance of recovering anything for his lands.

The only reason these lands will not bring the taxes is because they are being taken away by the Government for the purpose of constructing this spillway.

In justice to these people, Congress should immediately plan to take over these levee and drainage bonds and make just compensation for damages to this property. These improvement taxes were put on the lands for the purpose of helping the Army Engineers bring the levee up to a standard.

I quote from Senate bill No. 3740, of the Seventieth Congress, known as the Jones bill, and section 4, which is as follows:

> The United States shall provide flowage rights for additional destructive flood waters that will pass by reason of diversions from the main channel of the Mississippi River: Provided, That in all cases where the execution of the flood-control plan herein adopted results in benefits to property, such benefits shall be taken into consideration by way of reducing the amount of compensation to be paid.
> The Secretary of War may cause proceedings to be instituted for the acquirement by condemnation of any lands, easements, or rights of way, which, in the opinion of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers, are needed in carrying out this project, the proceedings to be instituted in the United States district court for the district in which the land, easement, or right of way is located. In all such proceedings the court, for the purpose of ascertaining the value of the property and assessing the compensation to be paid, shall appoint three commissioners, whose award, when confirmed by the court, shall be final. When the owner of any land, easement, or right of way shall fix a price for the same, which, in the opinion of the Secretary of War is reasonable, he may purchase the same at such price; and the Secretary of War is also authorized to accept donations of lands, easements, and rights of way required for this project. The provisions of sections 5 and 6 of the river and harbor act of July 18, 1918, are hereby made applicable to the acquisition of lands, easements, or rights of way needed for works of flood control: Provided, That any land acquired under the provisions of this section shall be turned over without cost to the ownership of States or local interests.

The reading of this section above indicates that it would be the intention of the Government to condemn the lands affected by this overflow of water and pay just compensation for the damage done.

The landowners in this section who have made inquiry are informed that they are not now to receive compensation for the damages done to their lands, by reason of them being placed back of the fuse-plug levee and in the spillway which might be overflowed at any time.

If this is to be the policy, it certainly is manifestly unjust, and we do not believe that Congress can permit a thing of that kind to be done.

No one questions the right of the Government to condemn property for public use when public use requires it.

This section recites that the Secretary of War may cause proceedings to be instituted for the acquirement by condemnation of any lands, easements, or rights of way which, in the opinion of the Secretary of War and the Chief Engineer, is needed in carrying out the project. The said proceedings would be instituted in the United States district court for the district in which the land, easement, or right of way is located. In all such proceedings the court for the purpose of ascertaining the value of the property and ascertaining the compensation to be paid, shall appoint three commissioners whose report, when adopted by the court, shall be final.

This manner of determining the value of the property to be taken seems to me to be manifestly unjust to the property owner. As I see it, the rights of property are higher and greater than constitutional sanction and property should never be taken, damaged, or destroyed without just compensation. It is nothing but fair that a right of trial by jury as to the value of lands taken by condemnation should be always allowed to the property owner, and an appeal should be allowed on that if the property owner feels that he has not been properly compensated for his property.

I introduced a bill at this session of Congress and numbered 719, which is referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, to provide for the making of loans to drainage or other levee districts which form a part of the flood-control system and for the purpose of aiding agriculture which ought to be passed by this Congress at the earliest possible moment for the relief of the people not only in my State but in many other States that have been placed under like conditions.

The lands on the Mississippi River and its tributaries from Cairo, Ill., to where it empties into the Gulf of Mexico are the finest agricultural lands in the world and absolutely should be protected as they form the basis for our great agricultural wealth.

The levees built in my section were built for the purpose of helping to control the waters of the Mississippi and to aid in commerce and improve the lands for agriculture. I think that the Government could well afford to take over these levee bonds that have been levied against the lands that form this flood-control system and thus put the property holder free to where he may improve these lands and bring them back into use. If they could not be relieved wholly of their burden, it ought to be stretched out for a long period of time with a loan from the Government without interest, for a period of time so that the lands could be saved to the property owners, that will necessarily be lost to them unless some plan of this kind is adopted.

I have the utmost confidence in the President of the United States as a great engineer as well as a President, and I know that he personally investigated the conditions that prevail in the section I am speaking of around Arkansas City, McGehee, and from there on down to Montrose, La., and I am sure that he will not adopt a plan knowingly that will thus damage the lands in this section.

In the first place, if there is a necessity for having an outlet of the waters, as no one will deny, there is no reason or necessity in taking and damaging all the lands affected by the present plan outlined for a spillway over the richest lands in the world and destroying the best farming land in the State of Arkansas.

There have been other plans suggested of control that ought to be considered along with the present plan, and then have new plans proposed by competent engineers making such investigations as will be necessary to give the information in order to prevent the damaging and destroying of so much of the valuable lands affected in the spillway.

It is said by an engineer, Caroll Livingston Riker, that an outlet for the flood waters of the Mississippi River 3 miles wide, provided with a levee on each side for a minimum height of 40 feet and extending through the lowest part of the valley and in an almost straight line from Cairo to the Gulf, a distance of 530 miles, would safely conduct to the Gulf twice the water that has ever passed through the Mississippi River or through its alluvial valley. If this statement is true, and I have no reason to doubt it, would it not be better and far more practicable in this area that I have been speaking of, to confine it to a width of 3 miles, if necessary, until the spillway waters are carried into the Ouachita River and the Red River and by it to the Mississippi and thence into the Gulf of Mexico, than the turning of the waters as now proposed, over all that great section south of the fuse-plug levee and which has been called the spillway?

We hope that the President will adopt a plan of this kind or some similar plan that will not damage and destroy all of our valuable lands that are now contemplated to be damaged and destroyed in this spillway.

If the Mississippi River had three or four of the large bends that it makes straightened out so that it would have a quick and free flow into the Gulf, it is doubtful that it would ever overflow its banks.

Take the great curve between Rosedale, Miss., and Arkansas City, Ark., where the river makes a great bend and then comes back within a short distance of where the curve started, and then takes its course south, if a concrete spillway was made straight across, when the river got to a stage of a certain height, where it would not effect the commerce of the river and would permit it to flow across this straight channel into the river, and thus preventing the obstruction of the flow as it now is and similar changes made in two other curves near Greenville, Miss., and north of Lake Chicot in Arkansas, the controlled levee now built for the control of the Mississippi would likely be ample to carry the waters of the Mississippi at all times.

This, I am informed, is opposed by the engineers for the reason it is claimed by them, that it would injure or destroy the commerce of the Mississippi. That could not be true, because it would not flow through these places provided except when it reached a high stage of the river, and these could be controlled by gates and used when necessary to prevent a flood of waters on the lands south of it.

If the Ouachita and Red Rivers are to take care of the waters that are to flow through a spillway contemplated it will be necessary to make some improvement on the Ouachita and Red Rivers and which could be done at a reasonable expense and thus aid materially in getting the waters that now come through the Ouachita and Red Rivers on and into the Gulf before the flood water from the Mississippi and its upper tributaries reached them.

The Ouachita heads in a mountainous country and its flow could be quickly carried into the Red River and from there to the Mississippi and on into the Gulf if proper attention was given to it. If this river is to receive waters of the spillway, the Ouachita should be cleared of all obstacles that now obstruct it along its banks, by timber and brush and by the formation of islands in said river covered with timber between Remmel Dam and where said stream empties into the Red River.

We hope that President Hoover will not adopt the plan suggested by Mr. Jadwin for this territory, but will devise a comprehensive plan of taking care of the waters in this section and recommend it to Congress for its approval.

I have just received the following letter from Judge James M. Smith, county judge of Desha County, Ark., that was written on the 7th day of June and which shows the distressed condition there now, and which reads as follows:

McGEHEE, ARK., June 7, 1929.

Hon. D. D. GLOVER, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. GLOVER: Several weeks before you went to Washington I called your attention to the Tyson agricultural bill, same being Senate bill No. 1142, which, if passed, would reappropriate something like $60,000 for flood agricultural extension funds, in which Arkansas would share.

In writing you several weeks ago I gave you some idea as how this county has suffered on account of the high water this year, but in order to get the information to you again I am going to briefly rehearse conditions here. For several weeks something like 130,000 acres have been under flood waters, of which amount something like 14,000 acres of land had been planted to crops, which have been ruined; 5,000 acres of land have been ruined by seep water and 4,000 people have been homeless. You can therefore see that a considerable part of our county is in distress.

In addition to the above, a great many people have been thrown out of work on account of high-water scare and have been unable to pay their taxes. This has caused an unusually large delinquent list of lands in this county this year. Our revenues are short for the further reason that a great many people have recovered from the 1927 flood only in a small manner. We had hoped to continue the agricultural extension work on our resources after July 1 of this year, but in the face of such adverse conditions it seems hardly possible.

Thanking you for your attention to this matter and with best personal wishes, I am,

Yours very truly,

JAMES M. SMITH,
County Judge.

Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that before this Congress took its recess that we should pass a bill giving relief to these people who are in such great distress and who are as worthy as any people anywhere. I hope that in the near future that the situation we are now in as to flood control may be clarified, and that justice may be done to all who are concerned.

Mr. Speaker, in addition to the letter I have just read from Judge Smith I have another from Mr. E. E. Hobson, a very worthy and capable gentleman who lives at Arkansas City, and who describes the conditions there and draws a darker picture of conditions than is described in the letter I have just read. Congress should give immediate consideration to this condition. [Applause.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not recognize the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I very much fear that I cruelly misunderstood the Speaker. I asked him this morning for permission and told him in view of the general demand for the legislation——

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Nebraska desired to enlighten the House as to the merits of the resolution, to which he himself would be very glad to listen, but should not agree and would not agree with any gentleman in advance to recognize him for the purpose of passing legislation.

Mr. HOWARD. I think I owe it to the Speaker to say that I understood him to say, inasmuch as this seemed to be a general field day for unanimous-consent legislation, that I could have unanimous consent to call up this resolution. That is what I understood the Speaker to say; but, of course, I did not understand him rightly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair regrets that there should have been any misunderstanding.

ADDRESS BY HON. WILLIAM TYLER PAGE

Mr. MANLOVE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by placing therein the address delivered over the radio on the night of May 29, 1929, by Hon. William Tyler Page, the illustrious Clerk of the House of Representatives, on the anniversary of the birth of that fearless patriot, Patrick Henry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANLOVE. I can think of no student of American history more fitted to sketch the life of this illustrious American patriot than the distinguished author of The American Creed, the Hon. William Tyler Page, and I therefore consider it not only a privilege but a pleasure to present the same.

The address is as follows:

PATRICK HENRY, EMINENT AMERICAN STATESMAN

Like so many of the early rugged Americans who helped to mold the Republic, Patrick Henry was born in Virginia, the second son in a family of nine children. His paternal ancestry was Scotch. The education of the youth was obtained at a little school near his home, and after the age of 10 from his father, who conducted a grammar school at his residence. Patrick's proficiency in his studies, however, with the possible exception of mathematics, was eclipsed by his love for outdoor sports and activities. A clerkship in a country store at 15, an unsuccessful partnership as storekeeper with his elder brother at 16, and a second failure at storekeeping later, were rather dismal milestones in his early career. A love for the study of history, and especially that of Greece and Rome, had replaced his general youthful indifference to educational matters, and thenceforth he read his Livy clear through once each year.

Patrick Henry was admitted to the bar at 24, but it is not recorded that his financial emoluments at first resulting therefrom were marked. His first legal victory was as counsel for the collector of the county, at 27 years of age, in what became known as "the parson's cause." Following his rather remarkable and unexpected display of eloquence on behalf of the people, he was accorded the title of "the orator of nature," and given distinct recognition for his oratorical attainments. His legal success thereafter was assured.

In 1765 came Patrick Henry's election to the House of Burgesses. Here he distinguished himself as the author of certain vigorous resolutions opposing the series of unpopular stamp acts. The keynote for the struggle for independence was predicated upon the last act of this character that was passed by a majority of but one. It provided that "The general assembly of this colony has the sole right and power to lay taxes and impositions upon the inhabitants of this colony." Patrick Henry's fiery resolution of denunciation of this iniquitous proposal had much weight in determining the final issue of the Revolutionary War.

In 1774, following other intervening honors which the limitations of time and space prevent our mentioning, he was selected as a delegate to the Virginia convention, which was the first public assembly to recommend an annual General Congress. He was also a delegate to the old Continental Congress. In 1775, in a remarkable address before the Virginia convention he moved that "the colony be immediately put in a state of defense," and at the head of a body of militia he required the officials of the Crown to pay £330 for powder that had been secretly removed by order of the royal Governor Dunmore.

This act of Lord Dunmore aroused the colony to a high pitch of resentment, which was temporarily allayed by a few leading loyalist pacifists. But Patrick Henry said, "We must fight." He demanded the return of the gunpowder or its equivalent value in cash. With about 150 well-armed and equipped troops he advanced as far as Doncaster. At this point he was met by my great-great-grandfather, Carter Braxton, afterwards a signer of the Declaration of Independence, who interposed his influence in warding off the impending blow. My forbear, Braxton, was the son-in-law of Col. Richard Corbin, the King's receiver general. Braxton persuaded Corbin to settle for the gunpowder to avoid bloodshed, and Colonel Corbin gave Braxton a bill on Philadelphia for the value of the gunpowder. Braxton then paid this over to Patrick Henry, taking his receipt. Henry, being satisfied, returned with his company to Hanover, where they were temporarily disbanded. But for this transaction possibly Williamsburg, instead of Lexington, would have marked the place where the first shot of the Revolution was fired. When the Revolution actually came Colonel Corbin renounced allegiance to the Crown and was numbered among the American patriots.

Patrick Henry was appointed colonel of the first regiment and commander of all the forces to be raised in Virginia, but after a misunderstanding he submitted his resignation. He was also a member of the Second Continental Congress of 1775 and of the Virginia convention of 1776, which had been elected "to take care of the republic," the royal governor having precipitately left the scene. After framing a new constitution, Patrick Henry was elected by this convention on the first ballot as the first (then) republican governor, being reelected in 1777 and 1778, and again in 1784, after an interim in the legislature.

After a successful period in the practice of law, as a result of which he paid all of his debts and acquired a certain amount of financial affluence, he withdrew to private life. In 1795 he declined the offer of President Washington to head his Cabinet as Secretary of State, and the following year declined the nomination for Governor of Virginia. In 1797, also, he refused to be a member of the mission to France, which position had been offered by President John Adams. In 1799 he was elected to the State legislature, but never took his seat, his death having occurred on the 6th of June.

Admittedly wrong in his vigorous opposition to the proposed Federal Constitution, Patrick Henry may yet be ranked a great statesman. It was, however, as a patriot espousing, with his great gift of oratory, the cause of American liberty, that he wielded his most important influence on the history of his beloved land.

It is unfortunate that the art of shorthand reporting had not been perfected at the time when Patrick Henry delivered many of his brilliant orations. We are indebted to John Adams, a delegate to the First Continental Congress from Massachusetts, for a few notes which constitute the only record of the great speech of Patrick Henry's in opening the deliberations of this historic Congress at Philadelphia on September 4, 1774, which address won for Patrick Henry the reputation of being the foremost orator on the Continent. It was then that he gave utterance to those words that revealed him as an American and not merely a colonist. "The distinctions," he proclaimed, "between Virginians, Pennsylvanians, New Yorkers, and New Englanders are no more. I am not a Virginian, but an American."

We will have time for but certain excerpts from Patrick Henry's great address delivered in 1775 to the convention of delegates, by which he is best known, as follows:

"I have but one lamp by which my feet are guided; and that is the lamp of experience. I know of no way of judging of the future but by the past. And judging by the past, I wish to know what there has been in the conduct of the British ministry for the last 10 years to justify those hopes with which gentlemen have been pleased to solace themselves and the House? Is it that insidious smile with which our petition has been lately received? Trust it not, sir; it will prove a snare to your feet. Suffer not yourselves to be betrayed with a kiss. Ask yourselves how this gracious reception of our petition comports with these warlike preparations which cover our waters and darken our land. Are fleets and armies necessary to a work of love and reconciliation? Have we shown ourselves so unwilling to be reconciled that force must be called in to back our love? Let us not deceive ourselves, sir.

"These are the implements of war and subjugation; the last arguments to which kings resort. I ask, gentlemen, sir, what means this martial array, if its purpose be not to force us to submission? Can gentlemen assign any other possible motives for it? Has Great Britain any enemy in this quarter of the world to call for all this accumulation of navies and armies? No, sir; she has none. They are meant for us; they can be meant for no other. They are sent over to bind and rivet upon us those chains which the British ministry have been so long forging. And what have we to oppose to them? Shall we try argument? Sir, we have been trying that for the last 10 years. Have we anything new to offer on the subject? Nothing. We have held the subject up in every light of which it is capable; but it has been all in vain. Shall we resort to entreaty and humble supplication? What terms shall we find which have not been already exhausted? Let us not, I beseech you, sir, deceive ourselves longer. Sir, we have done everything that could be done to avert the storm which is now coming on. We have petitioned; we have remonstrated; we have supplicated; we have prostrated ourselves before the throne and have implored its interposition to arrest the tyrannical hands of the ministry and Parliament. Our petitions have been slighted; our remonstrances have produced additional violence and insult; our supplications have been disregarded; and we have been spurned, with contempt, from the foot of the throne. In vain, after these things, may we indulge the fond hope of peace and reconciliation. There is no longer any room for hope. If we wish to be free—if we mean to preserve inviolate those inestimable privileges for which we have been so long contending—if we mean not basely to abandon the noble struggle in which we have been so long engaged, and which we have pledged ourselves never to abandon until the glorious object of our contest shall be obtained, we must fight! I repeat it, sir, we must fight! An appeal to arms and to the God of Hosts is all that is left us!

"They tell us, sir, that we are weak; unable to cope with so formidable an adversary. But when shall we be stronger? Will it be the next week or the next year? Will it be when we are totally disarmed and when a British guard shall be stationed in every house? Shall we gather strength by irresolution and inaction? Shall we acquire the means of effectual resistance by lying supinely on our backs and hugging the delusive phantom of hope until our enemies shall have bound us hand and foot? Sir, we are not weak if we make a proper use of the means which the God of nature hath placed in our power. Three millions of people armed in the holy cause of liberty, and in such a country as that which we possess, are invincible by any force which our enemy can send against us. Besides, sir, we shall not fight our battles alone. There is a just God who presides over the destinies of nations, and who will raise up friends to fight our battles for us. The battle, sir, is not to the strong alone; it is to the vigilant, the active, the brave. Besides, sir, we have no election. If we were base enough to desire it, it is now too late to retire from the contest. There is no retreat but in submission and slavery! Our chains are forged. Their clanking may be heard on the plains of Boston. The war is inevitable—and let it come. I repeat it, sir, let it come!

"It is in vain, sir, to extenuate the matter. Gentlemen may cry peace, peace—but there is no peace. The war is actually begun. The next gale that sweeps from the north will bring to our ears the clash of resounding arms! Our brethren are already in the field. Why stand we here idle? What is it that gentlemen wish? What would they have? Is life so dear or peace so sweet as to be purchased at the price of chains and slavery? Forbid it, Almighty God! I know not what course others may take, but as for me, give me liberty or give me death!"

If the shot fired at Lexington was heard around the world, it was but the repercussion of the voice of Patrick Henry crying for liberty, a voice whose ominous and prophetic tones made tyranny tremble on its throne.

What John the Baptist was to the Messiah whose coming was to unloose the shackles of a sin-bound world Patrick Henry was to the cause of civil liberty and American independence.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, if I may be indulged a moment, I wish to ask the Speaker a question. In view of the statement of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HOWARD] and the Speaker's reply, may the House understand that when the Speaker permits one to submit a unanimous-consent request for legislation he indorses the legislation and is willing that Congress shall give its consent to it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would not go as far as that. The Chair occasionally recognizes a gentleman to bring up a matter of legislation which the Chair does not himself fully approve.

Mr. GARNER. In view of that statement the gentleman from Nebraska was under the impression that the Speaker would recognize him to submit a request for unanimous consent for the consideration of certain legislation, and it was my thought in view of that statement that the Speaker ought to recognize him for that purpose. But if the Speaker's position is that he will not recognize anyone to take up any legislation which the Speaker does not agree to, of course the Speaker is quite consistent.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Texas in favor of the legislation referred to?

Mr. GARNER. I am not; but if I were Speaker of the House, with all due respect to the present occupant of the chair, I would adopt either one of two policies. I would either take the responsibility of not submitting a unanimous-consent request for the consideration of legislation which I did not approve or I would leave the field entirely open and not discriminate against anyone.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be glad, if he is a Member of the House when the gentleman from Texas is Speaker, to see which of those two alternatives the gentleman from Texas follows.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. And with all our affection for the gentleman from Texas we hope that that situation will not arise very soon.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement of the gentleman from Texas, having called up the matter, lest the Speaker be misunderstood by those here or elsewhere, I ask that the Speaker inform himself, if he is not already so informed, with reference to the subject of the resolution which I tried to have considered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he understands the purport of the resolution.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE BUILDING—LAYING OF THE CORNER STONE

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including the address and other matters in connection with the laying of the cornerstone of the Commerce Department Building in Washington on yesterday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the laying of the corner stone of the Department of Commerce Building at 4 o'clock on June 10, 1929, was a memorable occasion that I shall never forget.

The events of that hour are significant and should be perpetuated in our recorded annals that future generations may read.

THE NEW BUILDING

The new building for the United States Department of Commerce is planned to be one of the great office buildings of the world. It will occupy three complete city squares. Its length, 1,050 feet, exceeds that of the United States Capitol by 300 feet, though its breadth, 325 feet, is 25 feet less. It is also longer than the British Houses of Parliament by 110 feet, though not as wide. The land area occupied is about 345,000 square feet, nearly 8 acres. The building will rise seven stories above ground. Construction underground will include a complete basement for general use, with a subbasement for the heating and power plant.

The setting for the building is one of natural beauty. With its southwest corner at Fifteenth and B Streets NW., it looks southward over the grounds of the Washington Monument and westward over the park lying south of the White House. The view northward will be over E Street and a triangular park toward Pennsylvania Avenue.

The building faces the east, where it will look out upon the central plaza inclosed by the other Government buildings included in the special development of this area. The Commerce Building is placed at the base of the triangle formed by the intersection of Pennsylvania Avenue and B Street, running from Sixth Street to Fifteenth Street. The Commerce plot runs from Fifteenth Street to Fourteenth Street and covers the area from B Street to E Street.

The structure itself will be of monumental type, but is characterized by great simplicity of treatment. Almost the only ornamentation is the central group of 24 columns on the east façade, and 4 porticos with 4 columns each on the west. Both north and south ends are relieved by a portico and a group of 14 columns. Triple arched gateways two stories high give direct access through the building to the interior courts where C Street and D Street originally ran, but above the gates the structural mass is carried solidly, making the edifice outwardly an unbroken unit.

The Commerce Building is, in effect, three complete rectangular buildings in one, the central cell being longer than those on either wing. This larger rectangle has an interior wing running east and west the full height of the structure, dividing the area into two courts. A single large court is maintained above the first floor in each of the rectangles forming the end structures, a provision of space for expansion in the future.

The net floor area provided within the entire building is 1,092,800 square feet, sufficient to accommodate all the branches of the department, except the Bureau of Standards, which has its own plant in the suburban district of Washington.

Departmental organizations have been grouped within the building with as much attention to efficient arrangement as available space and special individual needs will permit. In the middle group are the general executive and administrative functions, as represented by the office of the Secretary, the Assistant Secretaries, the solicitor, and the chief clerk's forces. On the top floor is specially designed skylighted space for the library. In the basement a large cafeteria with the necessary kitchens is provided. A large conference room opposite the main entrance is capable of seating a thousand persons, while smaller conference rooms have also been provided in the same vicinity. Such general services as telephone switchboards, telegraph room, mail room, multigraph, and mimeograph room are likewise allocated to this section. In the basement are provisions for the various mechanical shops, garage, and file storage.

The more compact bureaus and services of the department are also assigned to the central part of the building. These include the aeronautics branch, the radio division, and the Bureaus of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, Lighthouses, Mines, Fisheries, Navigation, and Steamboat Inspection.

The south rectangle of the building is assigned to the Coast and Geodetic Survey and the Census Bureau. Basement, first and second floors have been specially designed to meet the needs of the engineers, technicians, and the mechanical plant of the Survey. Upper floors have been designed for the Bureau of the Census, where their statistical services will have ready access to the centrally located bureaus by corridors linking the south and central wings. A mechanical laboratory for construction of statistical machinery is given the Census Bureau in the basement.

The north rectangle is assigned exclusively to the Patent Office. This structure from top to bottom is built to fit the special needs of this service as developed by a close study of its technical, legal, administrative, and public serving functions. It has many special features. One of the most attractive to the public will be the grouping of all public-serving units on the ground floor. These units, such as copy sales, cashier, mail, application, assignment, manuscript, and photostat are also grouped with direct relation to the flow of work between them. The most impressive interior will be the spacious, high-ceilinged public search room, record room, and library, grouped on the first floor at the northwest corner. Executive and judicial activities are grouped on the third floor, with special provision for hearing chambers, anterooms, and executive groups.

The examining corps is assigned to the four upper floors. It is planned to have semi-private space for each examiner, through cubicles of clear glass and steel with ample space on the open side for a private corridor and his group of patent files. A standard arrangement has been worked out to meet the needs of the normal examining division, consideration being given to factors of convenience, supervision, light, privacy, quietness, and future expansion.

In the basement of the Patent Office rectangle, which is carried throughout the entire building and the courtyard, special steel stacks of two to four stories height are provided to care for the steadily accumulating official records, books, and the salable printed copies of the American patents.

Four banks of elevators serve the Patent Office wing, while the central wing has 10 banks, and the south wing 4, each bank consisting of 2 passenger elevators. Many of the banks face each other across corridors, thus centralizing the service. Additional provision is made for freight elevators, and special chutes and hoists where needed.

The principle laid down for interior construction is "As few structural partitions as possible. No partitions unless necessary. Where necessary, utilize clear glass and steel." This conserves floor space and light, simplifies supervision, provides flexibility for rearrangements, and reduces cost.

Special attention will also be given later to noise-deadening, mechanical conveyors and other improved equipment.

THE BUILDING

The building for the Department of Commerce, situated at the base of the so-called Pennsylvania Avenue triangle group, was authorized in acts approved May 25, 1926, and March 5, 1928, with a limit of cost of $17,500,000.

The structure will be 1,050 feet in length, 325 feet in width, and 7 stories high. It will extend from B street to E Street, and from Fourteenth Street to Fifteenth Street, occupying nearly 8 acres. The net floor area will be 1,092,800 square feet, sufficient to accommodate all the branches of the department except the Bureau of Standards, which is housed in specially constructed buildings in the suburban district of Washington.

The first contract for the excavation was awarded November 9, 1927; the contract for foundation work was awarded October 5, 1928; and the contract for the superstructure was awarded April 2, 1929. It is expected that the building will be completed in the early spring of 1932.

The design of the Department of Commerce is based on the classic, but in detail and general freedom of design perhaps resembles more the buildings done by San Macheli during the Italian Renaissance. The Doric Order is used in part for porticos resting on a massive base of the lower two stories of the building, which are heavily rusticated. The long colonnade facing Fourteenth Street is surmounted by a high attic with a large inscription and crowned by a carved cheneau.

OFFICIAL DUTIES

Although the Department of Commerce is, to some extent, an administrative agency, its more important functions are promotive. Through five of its bureaus it administers laws designed to aid marine navigation, but seven other bureaus are engaged almost entirely in activities concerned with the promotion of the Nation's industry and trade.

In its purely administrative capacity the department maintains the coast lights, charts the coastal waters, registers and inspects vessels of the merchant marine and aircraft engaged in commercial occupations, enforces the navigation laws, provides aids to navigation on commercial airways, and inspects radio communication and broadcasting stations. As a service agency it helps industry to simplify processes, to increase output, to eliminate waste in production and distribution, and to reduce unemployment; it carries on investigations and research to facilitate the production, transportation, and sale of the vast quantities of goods produced by the industries; it assists the mining industry to eliminate waste and safeguard lives; it conserves the fisheries; through the grant of patents it encourages invention by protecting inventors in the exclusive right to their discoveries; it supplies trade information to American producers and exporters and aids them in developing markets for their goods abroad; it enumerates the population and compiles statistics showing the condition and progress of the Nation's industries; it assists in the promotion and development of the country's rapidly growing air-transportation system. All these activities come within the scope of the organic act of 1903, which created the department and required it to foster, promote, and develop the foreign and domestic commerce, the mining, manufacturing, shipping, and fishery industries, and the transportation facilities of the United States.

ORIGIN

By an act approved February 14, 1903, Congress established a Department of Commerce and Labor. The act of March 4, 1913, changed the designation of the Department of Commerce and Labor to Department of Commerce, and established a Department of Labor. Until the Department of Commerce (and Labor) was organized in 1903, the Treasury Department was the principal agency of the Government through which supervision of the commercial and industrial life of the Nation was administered. The record of events from the close of the Revolution to the Constitutional Convention at Philadelphia in 1787 shows that the desire to foster the commerce and trade of the States was the paramount and controlling argument which made the Union possible. The documentary history of the Constitution discloses that the designation "Secretary of Commerce and Finance" was considered for the department which was finally called the Department of the Treasury.

Aeronautics branch: The air commerce act, approved May 20, 1926, provided for the promotion and regulation of civil aeronautics by the Department of Commerce.

Radio division: The first Federal statute dealing with radio became effective in 1911 and simply required apparatus and operators on ocean steamers. By the passage of the radio act of 1927 the radio service was set up as a separate division.

Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce: This bureau was created by an act approved August 23, 1912, which consolidated under that name the Bureau of Manufactures and the Bureau of Statistics. The Bureau of Manufactures was established under the organic act of February 14, 1903, whereas the Bureau of Statistics had its inception in an act of Congress approved February 10, 1820. The Bureau of Statistics was established as a separate unit in the Treasury Department by an act approved July 28, 1866, and transferred to the Department of Commerce July 1, 1903.

Bureau of the Census: The first enumeration of population after the establishment of our present form of government was made under the act of March 1, 1790. The Secretary of State had general supervision, beginning with the census of 1800 and until the Interior Department was established in 1849, where it remained until transferred to the Department of Commerce July 1, 1903.

Bureau of Standards: By Senate resolution of May 29, 1830, the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to have examination made of the weights and measures in use at the principal customhouse. On July 1, 1901, Congress established the National Bureau of Standards as an independent bureau of the Treasury Department. The bureau was transferred to the Department of Commerce on July 1, 1903.

Bureau of Fisheries: By a joint resolution approved February 9, 1871, Congress provided for the appointment of a Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, and the establishment functioned directly under Congress until July 1, 1903, when it became a bureau of the Department of Commerce.

Bureau of Lighthouses: By an act of August 7, 1789, Congress authorized the maintenance of lighthouses and other aids to navigation. The work was placed under the Treasury Department, where it continued until July 1, 1903, when it was transferred to the Department of Commerce. In 1852 Congress created the Lighthouse Board, which supervised the service until July 1, 1910, when the Bureau of Lighthouses was established.

Coast and Geodetic Survey: This bureau was organized by an act of Congress of February 10, 1807. With the exception of two years under the Navy Department the bureau was under the Treasury Department until July 1, 1903, when it was transferred to the Department of Commerce.

Steamboat Inspection Service: An act of Congress of July 7, 1838, was the first Federal legislation to safeguard the lives of passengers on steam vessels. The Steamboat Inspection Service was established by an act of Congress of August 31, 1852, as a branch of the Treasury Department. It was transferred to the Department of Commerce on July 1, 1903.

Bureau of Navigation: The third act of the First Congress, passed July 20, 1789, provided for duties on tonnage of vessels. Additional provisions were enacted from time to time until an act of July 5, 1884, which established the bureau. The administration of the laws continued under the Treasury Department until the establishment of the Department of Commerce in 1903.

Patent Office: The first patent act was approved April 10, 1790, and the Department of State exercised supervision over the service until 1849, when it was transferred to the newly created Department of the Interior. On April 1, 1925, the office was transferred to the Department of Commerce.

Bureau of Mines: In 1904 Congress provided for testing of coal and lignites, and in 1908 it authorized the United States Geological Survey to investigate mine explosions. The Bureau of Mines was established in the Department of the Interior by an act approved May 16, 1910. On July 1, 1925, it was transferred to the Department of Commerce.

THE DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE

The organization of the department as of June 10, 1929, follows:

Secretary of Commerce, Robert P. Lamont.
Assistant Secretary of Commerce, Julius Klein.
Assistant secretary for aeronautics, William P. MacCracken.
Solicitor, Ephraim F. Morgan.
Administrative assistant to the Secretary, Malcolm Kerlin.
Chief clerk, Edward W. Libbey.

ADDRESSES

I shall now append the distinguished and enlightening addresses in the order in which they were delivered:

ADDRESS BY HON. ROBERT PATTERSON LAMONT, THE SECRETARY OF COMMERCE, AT THE LAYING OF THE CORNER STONE OF THE DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE BUILDING

We are met here to-day to do more than lay the corner stone of a great building. We must mark the significance of the occasion. We are not only to celebrate the erection in the Capital City of the Nation of a splendid building dedicated to commerce; nor merely to remark its imposing dimensions, its dignity of architectural style, its beauty of line and mass and classic detail; nor are we just to remind ourselves that this building which will rise here will be distinguished even in this day of bigness and in this city of beauty.

Situated as it is and constituting as it does the base of the marvelous triangle of Government buildings soon to be erected, the apex of which points toward the matchless Capitol, this huge structure will house the youngest but one of the governmental departments, a department that did not come into existence till 114 years after the formation of the Government. It is true some of the bureaus which it now administers have existed since early times, independently or under the jurisdiction of one or other of the earlier organized departments. But it is indeed remarkable that a separate department, devoted to the interests of the rapidly growing commerce and industry of the Nation, should not have been established earlier in our history.

Long before the adoption of the Constitution itself numerous intercolonial and State conventions had been held to discuss matters of trade, and, in the words of Madison, "to consider how far a uniform system in their commercial regulations may be necessary to their common interest and permanent harmony." And during the period between the close of the Federal convention and the ratification of the Constitution Alexander Hamilton said: "The importance of the Union in a commercial light is one of those points about which there is least room to entertain a difference of opinion, and which has, in fact, commanded the most general assent of men who have any acquaintance with the subject. This applies as well to our intercourse with foreign countries as with each other." After the Constitution had been ratified by 11 States it was almost solely considerations of commercial interest that forced the remaining States to join the Union.

Notwithstanding this early appreciation of the importance of commerce in our national economy, and notwithstanding later messages of Presidents on the subject, much discussion in Congress, resolutions of political parties, petitions from commercial organizations and boards of trade, a whole century went by before crystallization of public opinion took definite form. Then, in December, 1901, Senator Nelson introduced a bill in Congress to establish a Department of Commerce. After the usual vicissitudes, delays, and amendments the bill was finally passed; it was signed by the President February 14, 1903, and a Secretary of Commerce and Labor became the ninth member of the President's Cabinet.

The more recent history of this department—the building up of the organization, the creation in 1913 of a separate department having to do particularly with labor, immigration, etc., the creation of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, the rapid development and growth of that bureau from 1921 to 1928—all these things are known to you and need not be dwelt on here. If they were not known to you, they could easily be recalled to memory by the testimony of living witnesses of the highest authority, for it is a particularly happy circumstance that we have three of the seven earlier Secretaries of Commerce here to-day. It must be a great satisfaction to them, as it is to us, to know that they have each had an important part in creating the heart and soul and spirit of the department—that without which this building itself would be useless! I mean, of course, the organization, the men and women who will occupy this building; for these men and women are the Department of Commerce!

It is interesting and significant in this connection to quote a few lines from the address of Secretary Cortelyou on the occasion of the raising of the Nation's flag for the first time over the temporary building that housed the new department. He said: "No other department has a wider field, if the just expectations of the framers of the legislation are realized. None will have closer relations with the people or greater opportunities for effective work. While we can not dedicate a new and imposing structure to the uses of the department we can at least—and I am sure we all do—dedicate ourselves to the work which Chief Executives have recommended and Congress, in its wisdom, has set apart to be done."

After so long a delay in its founding, why has the Department of Commerce so soon attained to such proportions as to be granted these splendid facilities for its work?

The answer is, that the times have recently changed in an astounding manner, and that the United States has changed with them. With breath-taking speed, a revolution in our national economy has taken place, which is here symbolized by the size and importance of this magnificent building.

By how much the times have changed since this department was organized, 26 years ago, a few typical facts bear witness. Our population has increased 50 per cent. Manufactures have increased more than 400 per cent. Electricity, as measured in kilowatt-hours, has increased more than 3,000 per cent. Telephones from two and one-half millions to nineteen millions. In 1903 there was one automobile to every 2,500 persons; now there is one to every five. Our commerce is thus conducted on a vastly greater scale. It can no longer go forward in haphazard, guesswork fashion. To survive, business must be on an economically sound basis; it must proceed on knowledge of exact facts.

The situation of the United States, likewise, has changed in another direction. A debtor nation in 1914, our industry was mortgaged to European investors in the sum of about $5,000,000,000. But to-day we are probably the foremost creditor nation of the world—if we include war-debt operations—its various regions indebted to us in public and private loans to the total of nearly $20,000,000,000. From the subordinate position of a dependent debtor, we have leaped in a decade to preeminence as an independent industrial and commercial nation. This startling change has radically altered the relative importance of industry and commerce in our national life. Always strong partners of agriculture in the production of our national wealth, industry and commerce have shot forward recently to a truly imposing position in our economic scheme.

This changed situation is not regarded by our business men with thoughtless pride. We are not needlessly boastful at the conquest of new markets abroad. Rather our mood is one of sober responsibility; we feel that we are not merely possessed of an opportunity, but are charged with a duty so wisely to administer this trusteeship of wealth that we shall further enrich, not ourselves alone, but every race and country that is reached by the fertilizing and vivifying influence of our trade.

This building, then, is to be the new temple of a great American faith, the faith that as a business nation we hold in trust a high duty to serve the world as well as to get gain.

This building, furthermore, is to be a temple of truth, dedicated to enlarging the science as well as the practice of business.

Here is to be housed one of the great fact-finding institutions of the country. Here for the first time all the various bureaus and divisions of the department, with one exception, will be under one roof. Into this building will continue to pour facts and figures from every State and every foreign country to be analyzed, classified, combined, and compared, in short, made useful. Sources and markets for raw material are here to be investigated and reported, and new outlets found for manufactured goods.

Here will be housed an institution unique in the world, created and organized to help commerce and industry. From the beginning of history there has been close contact between business and government—but always for purposes of taxation and regulation. Here, however, is a department of the Government created to "foster, promote, and develop business."

Each bureau—Census, Survey, Fisheries, Lighthouses, Navigation, Standards, Steamboat Inspection, Foreign and Domestic Commerce, Aeronautics, Radio, Patents, Mines—will here contribute in its own way and in its particular field to advance American business.

As a people, we have reached a higher average level of living comfort than has ever before been attained in the history of the world. There is no reason why this level can not be maintained and gradually raised.

If through the activities of this organization, working in cooperation with American industry and commerce, continued progress can be made in simplification, standardization, elimination of wastes in manufacturing and selling, then costs and selling prices can be further reduced and markets widened. If our great quantity-production industries, which have been keyed up to vast outputs to supply the first-hand home markets, can find constantly expanding foreign outlets to take care of surpluses as home markets gradually shift to requisites for replacement, then present employment schedules and wages can be maintained. Then, at last, that magic combination discovered within the last decade, of high wages, low costs, and fair profits, can go on because we are only 6 per cent of the population of the world, because we occupy only 5 per cent of its habitable area, and because slowly but surely the living standards of other peoples will tend to rise to the level of our own, thereby steadily enlarging the markets for our products for generations to come.

Here, at length, we arrive at the true significance of this building. Its erection is momentous in its meaning because it is erected to serve the people. No activity of government is worth while, no discovery of science is of value, no advance in method of industry or transportation or commerce is of any real advantage, unless it ends in useful service to everyday men and women and children. We foster commerce that our people shall have a fuller opportunity, more comfortable homes, better education, and more leisure. It is to serve these ends that this building is being erected. It is to make these aspirations come to full fruit that the thousands of men and women who will labor here shall daily enter its doors. Congress, which has appropriated the funds for its construction, and the American people who provided those funds, here to-day dedicate to that service this great building.

AN ADDRESS BY THE HON. REED SMOOT AT THE LAYING OF THE CORNER STONE FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE BUILDING, WASHINGTON, D. C., JUNE 10, 1929

This is an occasion memorable in many ways. It affords keen gratification to the Government, particularly to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. It is a source of civic pride to the National Capital. It means much, I believe, for the future of American business. And it brings a special joy—very deep and poignant, I am sure—to those who are concerned in the work of the Department of Commerce, for it represents the approaching realization of their hopes. It means an end of the physical dispersion of their activities in the city of Washington; it holds out the promise of concentrated effort and the opportunity of greatly heightened usefulness.

In the magnificent structure that is soon to rise upon this spot we shall see embodied those principles of unity, of harmony, of service, which stand as the ideals toward which, I feel; the department has steadily and earnestly aspired.

The department has a vital, significant relationship to American business and American productive activity of many sorts. It has shown, on many occasions, its eagerness to cooperate. It strives to understand the basic problems. Mutual helpfulness is its constant aim.

In such a policy, I believe, the department is adhering to the conceptions of our great President, who has stood steadfastly for the principle that the truest efficiency is to be obtained through the linking of private initiative with cooperative governmental effort.

To Herbert Hoover the Department of Commerce owes an incalculable debt of gratitude—for his organizing genius; his masterly administrative skill; his creative imagination and amazing energy; his crystal-clear comprehension of the department's needs and possibilities, in relation to our national life. The Department of Commerce, as it stands to-day, is in the fullest sense a monument to him—and, in its newer incarnation on this spot, it will continue to be so, increasingly.

Commerce is assuredly one of the mightiest of all the civilizing, humanizing agencies. Its rewards provide extraordinary incentives for labor and for the application of mental energy. Repeatedly, throughout the course of history, it has brought about the broadening of frontiers, the penetration of new regions. Its developing demands have led man to utilize more fully, and to disseminate among his fellows, the resources of the earth. Commerce provides for every one of us indispensable comforts, enhances every phase of material well-being, and enriches immeasurably all our common life.

And, too, upon an even higher plane, commerce serves as an activating stimulus to friendly relations among peoples. Commerce to-day implies swift interchange, and not of goods alone but of methods and ideas as well. A lessening of friction, racial and international, can and should be one of the greatest benefits of trade. One of the founders of our Republic wisely linked together in a phrase the words "Peace, commerce, honest friendship."

I feel very deeply that modern business is moving definitely away from an exclusive preoccupation with selfish profit. Profit, to be sure, is utterly essential if our commercial structure is to remain sound, and it is profit which supplies the most compelling impetus to enterprise. But we have learned in recent years, I think, how inadvisable it is to direct our entire attention to that phase.

Business has been developing a vastly broader outlook—an acute awareness of the common good, a keen and ardent willingness to serve it. In our commercial community we see, on every hand, a generous "public-mindedness."

American commerce and industry—in their process of evolution, of rational organization—are evincing a sense of symmetry comparable to that which we shall see in this majestic new building. There is a closer, more careful adjustment of means to end. The expenditure of energy is more judiciously planned. We are moving rapidly away from things shabby and shambling—from all commercial methods that proved awkward and inept. The manifold parts of our economic edifice are being consciously coordinated—interrelated—made more shapely.

Business men are coming to be dominated more and more by conceptions not only of order but of beauty. In the fashioning of merchandise—the articles with which our commerce deals—beauty has become a potent and profitable force. Shop windows gleam with new colors and textures, with bold and fascinating adventures in design. Canons of good taste are altering, for the better, the commodities of trade. We are realizing more than we ever did in the past the imperative need for simplicity, dignity, fitness, and comeliness in the planning of our cities—the appearance of our homes—in fact, the whole structure and fabric of our environment. This building of which we are laying the cornerstone to-day will stand, I believe, as a consummate expression of that admirable impulse.

And we take delight in the knowledge that this building is to be but one of many here in Washington—all as impressive and appropriate as this—all serving as a concrete, tangible embodiment of the greatness of our Nation.

The Department of Commerce—if I rightly understand its spirit—rejoices in its opportunities to share, however modestly, in the progressive commercial tendencies and economic movements to which I have adverted so hastily to-day. The department touches contemporary life at many points. It promotes American trade in countless foreign markets, and endeavors to heighten its efficiency at home. It provides help for merchant shipping and strives to insure the safety of passengers and crews. It endeavors to further the advance of aviation. It fosters the fisheries. It is concerned with the problems of safety in our mines, and the protection and stimulation of the mineral industries.

In innumerable ways the department aids American industry through scientific investigation, patient and exhaustive research, and the consequent establishment of standards. It works for improvement in building and housing. It affords incentive and security for inventive genius through the operation of the patent system. It gathers all manner of statistics calculated to serve as guideposts for assured advancement in our national economy.

As we lay to-day the corner stone of this building, which we know will be truly splendid, let us hope that in a measure we are helping to lay also a foundation for the progressive betterment of economic life in this country. To that ideal we shall dedicate this structure. But I feel that we must go further than the dedication of any edifice of stone and steel, however majestic and pleasing that may be. We must dedicate ourselves to service, the service of America—an America mighty in material achievement, pulsating with power, noble in impulse, lofty in aspiration, swift in movement, and beautiful in aspect—adding to the sum of human happiness, courage, and dynamic faith.

In such manner may our Nation contribute toward the attainment of that indefinable but shining goal which Tennyson envisaged many years ago as "the one far-off divine event to which the whole creation moves."

ADDRESS OF HON. RICHARD N. ELLIOTT, CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, AT THE LAYING OF THE CORNER STONE OF THE DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE BUILDING, WASHINGTON, JUNE 10, 1929

A little more than three years ago—to be exact, on the 25th day of May, 1926—President Calvin Coolidge signed the Elliott-Fernald Public Building Act which authorized a building program in the District of Columbia calling for an expenditure of $50,000,000, and for other buildings in other parts of the Nation one hundred and fifteen millions. This law has been amended and supplemented by other acts of Congress until the total amount authorized for the National Capital amounts to $115,000,000 and for the Nation at large about two hundred and forty-eight millions, a total of $363,000,000, and will provide much-needed public buildings in all parts of the Nation. It will be expended at the rate of $35,000,000 annually. It is probably the most stupendous building program ever adopted by this or any other Government. It is unique in this: That it is the first time in history that our Government ever adopted a definite and businesslike program for the handling of the construction of its great public buildings.

To-day is a red-letter day in Washington. We are laying the corner stone of the world's greatest office building, which is to house the thousands of employees of the great Department of Commerce, one of the newest and yet one of the greatest executive departments of our Government. Under the guidance of that master genius, President Hoover, who was for many years head of the department, its importance grew by leaps and bounds until its activities reach into all parts of the world, aiding our citizens to carry on their commercial operations, great and small, with every civilized nation. His great work in this department caused the people of the United States to elect him President, and it must be a great pleasure to him to lay the corner stone of this great building which is a monument to his public service.

This building is of course the largest and most important of the hundreds of buildings contemplated in the act of May 25th, 1926, and the acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, but many other great buildings will be erected here as well as in New York, Chicago, Boston, Baltimore, Cleveland, St. Louis, and many other cities throughout the country. They will be much appreciated by the people of the country generally. I sometimes believe, however, that the smaller Federal buildings in the county-seat towns, far removed from the National Capital, are much more appreciated by the citizens of those places and create greater respect and reverence for our Government than do the buildings in the larger places. I hope the time will come at no distant day when the Government will be able to provide public buildings in all of the towns and cities of the country where the revenues of the post office are sufficient to warrant it.

The responsibility for carrying out this great building program is placed by law on the Secretary of the Treasury, and so far as post-office buildings are concerned the responsibility is divided between him and the Postmaster General. Secretary Mellon and Postmaster General Harry S. New, ably assisted by Hon. James A. Wetmore, the Acting Supervising Architect, and other assistants in the Treasury and Postoffice Departments have labored long and diligently to carry out the mandate of Congress and are entitled to great praise for the splendid work they have done in carrying out this building program.

A nation is judged by the character and education of its people, its public buildings, its homes, its literature and art, as well as by its natural resources. When the great buildings authorized in this program are all completed they will add much to the beauty and stateliness of the National Capital and other cities, and to the efficiency of our Government and to the health and comfort of the Federal employees, and will increase the respect of our people for the Government and elevate our Nation in the eyes of the world. It is a well-known fact that in these days when we are spending millions of dollars in research work, excavating the ruins of ancient cities, one of the things our students are most vitally interested in is the kind and character of the buildings they had in those days and from these we judge the civilization and culture of ancient times.

Another thing that must not be overlooked is the importance of this building program from the standpoint of business and labor conditions of the country, for after all the buildings are the products of labor, and the expenditure of $35,000,000 annually in this country will be felt in every avenue of business engaged in structural work. It will distribute millions of dollars each year to labor in all parts of the country.

As the author of the law under which this great program is authorized, I can look backward to-day over the past four years with a great deal of pride and satisfaction. When I assumed the position of chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House of Representatives I was met with a calendar containing more than 900 public building bills, asking for buildings in almost every city and hamlet in the country, and calling for an expenditure of more than $300,000,000. No bills of this character had been authorized since the passage of the act of March 4, 1913. President Calvin Coolidge was asking Congress to adopt the $50,000,000 program for public buildings in the National Capital, and the situation was not a happy or pleasant one for me to contemplate. I knew the old pork-barrel method of handling public-building legislation had fallen into disrepute and that a new method would have to be devised to handle this work. After careful study of the situation and consultation with many Members of the House and Senate I conceived the plan we have adopted and succeeded in getting the approval of the same by President Coolidge and Secretary Mellon. After a red-hot fight in the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House I finally succeeded in getting the bill reported to the House, with some amendments, and after another hard fight in the House it went to the Senate, where it was viewed with alarm by some and contempt by others and allowed to die at the end of the Sixty-eighth Congress.

I reintroduced the bill at the beginning of the Sixty-ninth Congress, and it was passed promptly by the House of Representatives by a vote of about three-fourths of the membership of that body. It went again to the Senate, where I succeeded in getting the late Senator Bert M. Fernald, of Maine, chairman of the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to take an interest in it, and he succeeded after a very hard fight in getting the Senate to pass the bill, which it did with some misgivings.

The law has worked well under the wise management of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General, and funds have been allocated to the various States, and buildings have been authorized in places where they were most needed throughout the country without regard to sectional or political affiliation. The Sixty-ninth and Seventieth Congresses will go down in history as having done more to provide sufficient and adequate public buildings to house the employees of our Government and promote the efficiency of the public service than all of the other Congresses combined. The individual members of the Committees on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House and Senate are also entitled to recognition here to-day.

I can not close this brief address on this auspicious occasion without paying a tribute to the memory of my good friend and associate the late Senator Bert M. Fernald, whose labor and sacrifices on the floor of the Senate in the passage of this public-building program entitles him to our praise and recognition. It was no easy task to pilot this great bill safely through the Senate against strong opposition. Senator Fernald was a sick man, and many times he was fighting with his back to the wall; but he brought the bill through and made it possible for us to lay the corner stone of this great structure to-day. Much important legislation relating to the development of Washington, however, has been passed by Congress since the death of Senator Fernald, all of which passed the Senate under the able leadership of Senator HENRY W. KEYES, of New Hampshire, his successor as chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate. He is also entitled to recognition for the part he has performed in making Washington the greatest capital in the world.

REMARKS OF GEORGE B. CORTELYOU AT THE LAYING OF THE CORNER STONE OF THE DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE, WASHINGTON, D. C., MONDAY, JUNE 10, 1929

This impressive scene inevitably recalls to me an earlier scene—26 years ago—when, on July 1, 1903, there assembled in my office in the Willard Building, 513 Fourteenth Street NW., a few Government officials and others to witness the formal transfer of a number of bureaus and offices to the new Department of Commerce and Labor, marking the beginning of that department as a full-fledged executive branch of the Government; later to become the Department of Commerce, with labor constituting a separate department.

The exercises on that occasion were simple and brief. From the short address that I made I quote the following sentence:

"While we can not dedicate a new and imposing structure to the uses of this department, we can, at least, and I am sure we all do, dedicate ourselves to the work which Chief Executives have recommended and Congress in its wisdom has set apart to be done."

Now—more than a quarter of a century later—the lack of a "new and imposing structure," to which I referred, is about to be remedied. However long postponed, we are happy that the time has come when the department is to have a home adequate to its needs.

But, however and wherever housed, there has never been any lack of the spirit of dedication to its work on the part of its personnel, from the highest to the lowest. That spirit has carried it to the front rank of the executive departments of the Government and has made it of invaluable service to the people.

In my successors the department has had a long line of distinguished Secretaries. It enjoys the rare distinction of having given to the country a President. It was Mr. Hoover's record as Secretary of Commerce that confirmed the people in the belief they had long entertained in his fitness to assume the great responsibilities of the Presidency—a belief amply justified by the event. The department, as well as the country, is fortunate in having as Chief Executive one who so thoroughly understands its needs and its problems.

Mr. Secretary Lamont, I appreciate deeply the privilege of being here to-day. As the first Secretary of the department over which you preside, I have followed its fortunes with the keenest interest. No one is happier than I that these have been so auspicious. With the completion of the great building that is to rise upon this site, a new era in the history of the Department of Commerce will begin. Those of us who were connected with it in the days of its organization and early development congratulate you on the opportunity for public service that lies before you, and wish you Godspeed.

ADDRESS OF PRESIDENT HOOVER AT THE LAYING OF THE CORNER STONE OF THE NEW DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE BUILDING IN WASHINGTON MONDAY AFTERNOON, JUNE 10, 1929, AT 4 O'CLOCK

On an occasion which so peculiarly marks the progress of this great national institution it is a particular pleasure to welcome those men who, as former Secretaries of Commerce, have contributed to its upbuilding. And I may perhaps be pardoned for an especial pride on this occasion, having served for seven years in the department and having had some part in the design and initiation of this building. Those who have presided over this department truly appreciate the significance and the inspiration of this occasion. It marks the emergence of the Department of Commerce into full maturity and service.

Setting the corner stone of any great public building in the city of Washington is also a milestone of progress, not only of the Capital but of the Nation as a whole. This building will be not only the largest single public structure in the city, but in its actual floor space it is said to be the largest office building in the world. It represents the most important structure in the new program for better accommodation of our Government and the beautification of our National Capital.

We use to-day the trowel with which President Washington laid the corner stone of the Capitol, 136 years ago. Its use can not but recall the growth of this city and of our country which that period so uniquely represents. When President Washington laid that corner stone, this particular spot was but a swamp traversed by little more than a cow path which led from the beginnings of the Capitol to the beginnings of the White House. Even when, seven years later, the administrative bureaus of the Government were moved from New York and Philadelphia and set up in Washington, they consisted in entire personnel of officials and clerical force, of less than 150 persons. Since that time the administrative functions of the Government have been expanded year by year until they now require twenty times as many officials for each million of people as were required then. While there may be complaints over the expansion in other directions, this department can not be a subject of them for it is devoted solely to aid and foster the development of higher standards of living and comfort of our people.

The beginnings of the idea to create a Department of Commerce are perhaps obscure. There was no provision in the Constitution for any Cabinet officer, department, or bureau. A nation struggling for liberty and freedom naturally gave more thought to provision for fundamental freedom by formulation of law for its protection than to the administration of those laws, but necessarily administration quickly followed.

In advising upon the divisions into which administrative work should be assigned, it is said that Alexander Hamilton proposed the creation of six departments—State, Treasury, War, Justice, Post Office and Trade. But out of economy the last-named department was not created. It was not until 114 years later that the functions which he then described emerged as the Department of Commerce.

As Secretary of the Treasury, however, Hamilton's vision well comprehended the necessities of Federal government activity in support of commerce and industry. Of the bureaus which are now included in the Department of Commerce, those of Patents, Census, Lighthouses and Navigation were established by him in the Treasury. During the hundred years before the founding of the department, other bureaus were created and finally brought together into a homogeneous organization with full cabinet representation under President Roosevelt, and with Mr. Cortelyou as its first Secretary. The 26 years since its foundation have shown an extraordinary expansion and change until the department has evolved into its present impressive size and helpfulness.

And its ideals are clear: That by cooperation and not by compulsion it should seek to assist in maintaining and giving the impulse of progress to commerce and industry in a nation whose successful economic life underlies advancement in every other field.

CALENDAR REFORM

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on calendar reform, accompanied by a chart and also newspaper articles.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, for quite some time there has been much discussion of calendar reform, and I feel that my own relationship to the subject is such that I would like to put the matter as clearly as possible to the Members of Congress.

I have made a thorough study of the whole question and realize how complicated and technical the subject is. Like most of you, I once believed the matter too complex for a layman's understanding. I was under the impression that only scientists could undertake to handle it. But now I know that the difficulties are not insurmountable and that it is the duty of all of us to inform ourselves thoroughly on the subject.

I hope I shall not be likened here to Lord Chesterfield, who wrote his son in 1751 explaining how he succeeded in bringing the House of Lords into line on this question when England was faced with a change in the calendar.

Lord Chesterfield wrote:

I was to bring in this bill which was composed of law jargon and astronomical calculations, to both of which I am an utter stranger. However, it was necessary to make the House think I knew something of the matter, and also to make them believe that they knew something of it themselves, which they do not. So, I resolved to do something better than speak to the purpose, and please them, instead of informing them. This succeeded, and ever will succeed; and many of them said I have made the whole matter very clear to them, when God knows, I had not even attempted it.

THOROUGH STUDY OF CALENDAR

On the contrary, Mr. Speaker, I shall deliberately go directly into the question itself and present all of the facts with the purpose of making them clear to you. I have made an earnest effort to go into every phase of the history and present situation of the calendar working and proposed reform.

I have the honor to be a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House, to which the resolution of my colleague, Mr. PORTER, chairman of the committee, was referred. House Joint Resolution 334 requests the President to "propose the calling of an international conference for the simplification of the calendar or to answer on behalf of the United States an invitation to participate in such conference." The resolution goes on at some length to describe the defects of the present calendar and points out the advantages of a new type of 13-month 28-day calendar, which has recently become known as the "Eastman Plan." Three pages of my colleague's resolution are devoted to the discussion of calendar difficulties and possible improvements in detail, and it is these three pages that will require a complete presentation of my differing viewpoint.

PROPONENTS STRESSED BUSINESS ADVANTAGES

Our Committee on Foreign Affairs spent many sessions hearing witnesses who described the advantages of the newly proposed calendar and we also heard many who represented the opposite viewpoint.

Of those who came as protagonists for the 13-month plan, practically all pointed out the business and commercial advantages. In fact, it may truthfully be said that the greatest arguments in behalf of the new plan are the benefits to transactions in commerce, bookkeeping, accounting, and auditing. Nearly all of the opponents were representatives of various religious denominations who appeared before the committee to point out how harmful the adoption of any 13-month plan would be to their religion. Because of this, the belief has spread that "business is in favor of the Eastman plan calendar and religion is against it"—an entirely erroneous idea.

NOT ALL OPPOSITION RELIGIOUS

I can easily understand how such an idea would spread, but, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call your attention to the fact that numerous arguments in opposition to the plan were brought before our committee which were not of a religious character. Likewise, I wish to bring to the notice of my colleagues the fact that when a committee of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States had this matter under consideration, the majority, it is true, were in favor of the change, but the minority—also sensible business men—rendered a report which should be given attention at this time, because the belief has spread that the chamber of commerce and all successful business organizations are whole-heartedly behind the new plan. I quote from the minority report signed by the members of that special committee of the chamber and will likewise point out to you that thousands of other business men object to the new proposal.

The minority report of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States reads:

The urgency toward a change in the Gregorian calendar comes to the chamber out of a reference by the International Chamber of Commerce, following the interest of the sponsoring committee of the League of Nations. It is one of those propositions which, apparently in no way taxing any one nation at the expense of another and having no political character which might offend, has had an easy launching. It excites the enthusiasm of individuals with minds given to logical expression, and once launched readily embraces the cordial support of well-meaning people who unthinkingly commit themselves to the perpetration of a nuisance. Most questions passed upon by this body relate to questions of fact, but this is peculiarly one in which its advocates are willing to pronounce themselves, offhand, without, we believe duly calculating the implications.

WOULD PROVE ANNOYANCE TO MILLIONS

Generally speaking, the civilized world does now possess, or is rapidly coming to possess, a calendar enjoying substantial uniformity. The infliction of a new calendar having radical departures from the present, or attempting to improve it, would mean annoyance to millions of people, would bring great discomfiture to great sects which view the present calendar with religious loyalty, and would offer nothing of substantial value to any single business which that business can not enjoy now, if it will.

The daily use of the calendar vitally concerns the intimate habits and views of vast millions of people in this country. The proposal to agitate a reform in the calendar as presented has no popular backing worth mentioning. It comes to this chamber with the studied support of but few people. A large group has been circularized, and, as often happens with catchy ideas, a great many people, many of them of business prominence, are giving this proposal their indorsement, without deep thought. We have not learned that these people are giving else but lip service toward the furtherance of the idea, though apparently a considerable sum of money is being spent to launch it.

SUBJECT NOT A TIMELY ONE

With this in mind, we are opposed to the recommendations of the committee which, we believe, should not at the present time have the encouragement of the chamber. Furthermore, we are opposed to the last recommendation which would seek to encourage our Government taking part in a conference on a subject in which the great body of this country not only have a vital concern but have as yet evinced no deep-seated interest. When the people themselves, through their accredited representatives, have been led to take an interest in this matter, it may be time for the chamber to bestow its consideration. Popular interest will be our warrant. Certainly there is no great business need for it. We do not believe the subject is a timely one.

However enthusiastic the proponents of the proposed change may seem to be, general business has little interest. Those who wish to use a system of accounting other than that based upon the present months are now doing so. Business, as such, should be careful not to intrude upon matters peculiarly of private concern as well as being interwoven with custom of long standing, unless a change is of transcending importance to business itself. The chamber of commerce can well avoid taking any step to commit itself in this matter.

Mr. Speaker, there are approximately 120,000,000 people in the United States and I sincerely doubt whether there are so many as a thousand who earnestly desire the change of the calendar under which civilization has been working for several centuries.

AN EDITOR'S VIEWPOINT

A well-known editor of one of our daily newspapers has expressed this idea humorously but to the point:

The average citizen does not hesitate to croak and complain about the things with which he is dissatisfied. He is not inclined to suffer any grievance, real or imaginary, in silence, but how often do you find anybody complaining about the calendar. We hear complaints about practically everything else—the weather, taxes, the high cost of living, inefficient government, the local baseball team, street paving, and the low quality of peanuts being sold, but when do you ever hear the enraged taxpayer stand up on his hind legs and complain because April has not as many days as July.

Mr. Speaker, because of the general impression that religious groups have presented the most serious objections to the proposed calendar reform, I wish to bring these objections to your attention in the fairest possible way. We must respect every religious denomination in our country and we must not feel that a minority group deserves less consideration than a large denomination, at the hands of those who are attempting "to bring about the advancement of business or science!" Too much is spoken about tolerance and too little about true respect for other religions. I would like my colleagues of the House to understand the objections of some of the religious groups and to realize the very important fact that when all of the details of this calendar reform are understood by leaders in every denomination, there will be a hue and outcry from sources unexpected. To-day the opponents of the bill may seem to be religious minorities, but to-morrow they will be joined spontaneously by almost every group and sect of religion in America.

In the meantime, Mr. Speaker, I urge you to note the following memorial which was offered to the Congress of the United States by official representatives of the Seventh-Day Adventist denomination. Its reasoning is clear-cut and will interest you, even though it does not represent your own point of view:

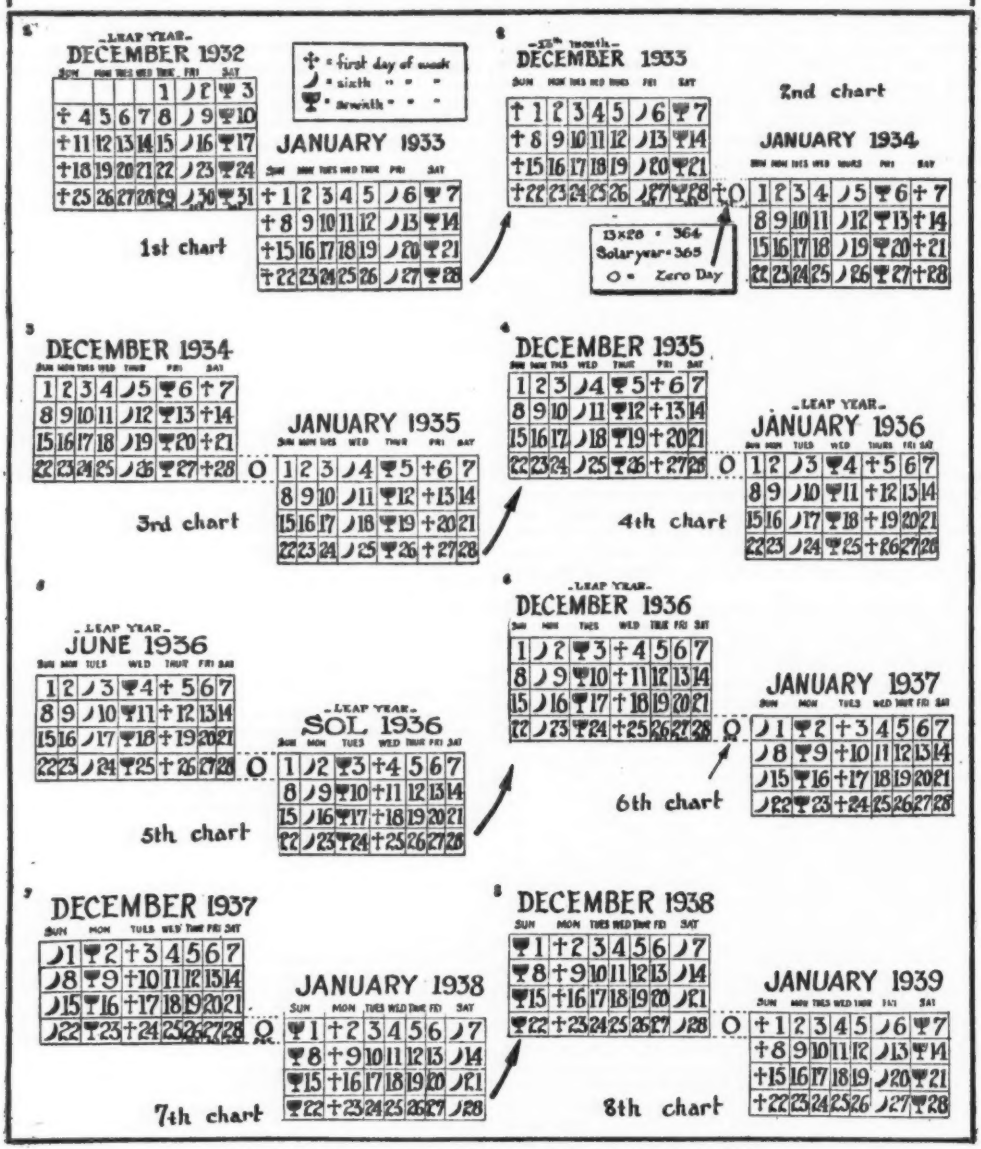
WHY ADVENTISTS ARE OPPOSED

We object to the submitted plan for the following reasons:

1. Because it interferes with the ancient religious customs and traditions of the various religious bodies for the sake of commercial advantage. We are not opposed to calendar changes, provided such changes preserve the ancient and divine arrangements of the fixed days of the week. The weekly cycle ordained by the Creator in the very beginning of time, according to the Biblical record, has never been altered, although changes have been made in the calendar from time to time. The days of the months have been changed to establish the correct length of the year, but never in all history is there a single record to be found (with the exception of France for a short period during its reign of terror) where the original week has been changed.

Economy and commercial advantage are important elements in the business life of a nation, but mercenary gain and progress are not the most important considerations that enter into life. The claims of God upon the soul, and the ancient customs and sanctions of religion, which were divinely ordained for all time to come, hold a far more sacred sway over the conscience of God's faithful children than any commercial consideration of the highest value can possibly hold whenever the spiritual and temporal come into open conflict. Civil government should never attempt to interfere in the free exercise of the conscience in religious matters, nor should it merely for the sake of facilitating business alter by human legislation religious customs established by divine authority.

WOULD NULLIFY THE SABBATH



2. Because this commercial calendar, which proposes to drop the 365th day of each year and an extra leap-year day every fourth year of the general reckoning of time as nameless zero days, and stipulates that they shall be observed as extra holidays and not be reckoned among the days of the week, would not only make Sunday, the first day of the week now observed conscientiously by millions of Christians in honor, as they believe, of the resurrection of Christ, a moveable and therefore a farcical memorial, but it would also, if followed, nullify the holy Sabbath of the God of heaven, the original seventh day of the week, which He commanded to be observed forever in honor of His creative and redemptive power. This proposed calendar makes no difference between the holy and the profane, between the sacred and the common days of the week, and thus robs God of His rightful authority to make and set apart holy days as distinct from secular days. God Himself put a difference between the days of the week upon which secular labor and business might be transacted, and the seventh day of the week which He hallowed, sanctified, and blessed. The divine law says, "The Lord blessed the seventh day." God's blessing on that specific day made it entirely different from the other days of the week, and the obligation to observe the seventh day of the week as holy time was strictly enforced by divine commandment, and God has never delegated to any human authority the prerogative to change His divine institution.

While the children of Israel wandered in the wilderness, God performed a threefold miracle on every seventh day of the week for a period of 40 years to teach His children that He Himself made a difference between the secular days of the week and the holy Sabbath, which was to be commemorated forever as the memorial of His created works. What God has so significantly set apart as "holy" should not be lightly esteemed by man as a thing of naught.

CALENDAR CHART

Showing—a. The "Wandering Sabbath," b. Accumulation, in six years, of seven "blank-days," equaling one week

Planned and Designed by SOL BLOOM

HOW SABBATH AND SUNDAY WOULD WANDER THROUGH THE WEEK

The above chart describes a plan for calendar revision that would involve a "blank day" at the end of each year, thus causing the Sabbath of the Jews and Sabbath-keeping Christians and the Sunday of first-day Christians to wander backward through the week. By noting the symbols for these days—the seven-branched candlestick for the Sabbath and the cross for Sunday—the resulting migration of these days may easily be followed through the years.

The proposal is to have the new calendar start the first of 1933, when the year normally begins on Sunday. Thus during that year the true order of the days of the week would be preserved, for Sunday is of course the first day of the week. But 13 months of 28 days each would give us only 364 days, instead of the 365 we need for the year. We would retire Saturday night, December 28, 1933, expecting to wake up to greet a Sunday morning. But no, the new calendar would make this a blank day, not reckoned in the count of the week. We would skip that one day and start in the second day—known as Sunday, January 1, 1934—to begin the count of the week again. This results, as the chart indicates, in making the true order of the days drop back one in 1934, Sunday coming on "Saturday" and the Sabbath coming on "Friday."

In leap year an additional blank day is added at the end of June. Thus every leap year the true order of Sunday and Sabbath falls back two days, one day the first half and another day the second half of the year. ("Sol," Latin for "sun," is the name proposed for the extra month.) Any plan that incorporates the "blank-day" principle would produce the above migratory effect upon the holy days of the various religious bodies. (The Moslem may note the effect upon his holy day by following the path of the crescent symbol through this chart.)

TRAMPLES RELIGIOUS RIGHTS

3. Because the proposed calendar as set forth in the plan of the joint resolution, if made effective by law, would trample upon the religious rights of all Sabbatarians and would inevitably lead to the persecution of all nonconformists. Under our compulsory school laws the children of Sabbatarians would be compelled to attend public school on their Sabbath days, or the parents would be subjected to fines and imprisonment. This proposed legislation would, in fact, destroy the religious freedom the Sabbatarian now enjoys in sending his children to Sabbath school and church on the particular day he regards as holy. The proposed plan would completely demoralize and disarrange the normal educational, professional, business, and industrial activities of conscientious Sabbath keepers, since under the proposed calendar the Sabbath would fall each successive year on a different day of the week.

4. Because, while it may be possible for astronomers, historians, chronologists, and observers of anniversaries, memorial days, birthdays, wedding days, etc., to work out, with considerable extra effort, their true dates in terms of the proposed calendar, yet to your petitioners the problem is one of conscientious conviction based on a fixed weekly memorial established by divine authority, which therefore can not be changed by any individual or by any constituted human authority.

MILLIONS ARE AFFECTED

5. Because, if religion is exempt from the jurisdiction of civil authority, much less can the legislative body exalt its mandates above the authority of God, and trample upon the sacred convictions of its conscientious citizens. The Sabbatarians who have suffered and sacrificed unto blood in all past ages in their loyalty to God's divine commandment to keep the true Sabbath holy and to preserve it from being lost from one generation to another without a break in its continued observance, can not be expected to surrender their sacred heritage and their religious conviction now. There are millions of orthodox Jews and hundreds of thousands of orthodox Christians who still observe the ancient Sabbath, and they will continue as they have done aforetime in spite of any human laws to the contrary. If Seventh-Day Adventists, Seventh-day Baptists, and the Jews should follow the migratory Sabbath as proposed in the new calendar, they would vitiate every reason for their existence as Sabbatarians. It is inconceivable that these conscientious people will now surrender their religious convictions for the sake of mercenary gain. This proposed change would necessitate the bringing in of two calendars, and would result in confusion and division where there is now peace and harmony. The conscientious Sabbatarians would properly refuse to follow the migratory Sabbath as he would still observe the seventh day of the unbroken weekly cycle, and so, in 1934 the Sabbatarian would observe the seventh day of the original week on Friday; in 1935 on Thursday, and in 1936, it being leap year he would be compelled to observe it on Wednesday and Tuesday according to the reckoning of the new calendar, if it is adopted and made effective by 1933 as is contemplated in the joint resolution.

For the reasons herein presented, we earnestly protest against the changes suggested in the calendar as proposed in the Porter joint resolution.

RELIGION VITAL IN LIFE

Mr. Speaker, such reasoning is not to be thrust aside without due consideration on the part of Members of Congress. Religion is a vital thing in the life of some people, thank God, and wherever it exists in earnest and sincere form it is the duty of the Government to see to it that it is fostered and encouraged and that no obstacles are placed in the way of those who have conscientious scruples. Remember also that the objection to a system which would affect the worship of the Sabbath is not basically one that is founded on utilitarian consideration; it arises out of a deep religious conviction—a conviction for which thousands of earnest souls have suffered in past centuries—even accepting martyrdom. Such religious observances must not only be tolerated but respected, and it is the duty of my colleagues in the House to thoroughly investigate the effects of changing the calendar and to weigh the social and religious harm resultant, as against the possible commercial benefits.

Mr. Speaker, the statement I made a little while ago may seem to you exaggerated, but I insist that it is strictly within the bounds of the truth: When leaders of other denominations realize the facts of this calendar change they, too, will rise in arms and object as strenuously as have the observers of the seventh-day Sabbath. Tens of millions of Christians who now worship on the first day of the week—the commonly called Lord's Day—have but to understand that the new calendar will necessitate their worshiping on other days than the real Sunday to cause them to battle boldly also for the protection of the original holy Sabbath.

WIDESPREAD OPPOSITION DEVELOPING

I am not speaking from mere theory, Mr. Speaker. We have during the past few months been in consultation or correspondence with some of the leading bishops and dignitaries of various Christian denominations, and I know whereof I speak when I declare that practically all Christian denominations will stand in opposition to any new calendar which does not provide for Christian worship on the Lord's Day—the first day of the week as it is now observed.

In almost every instance these ecclesiastics have at first favored the 13-month 28-day calendar, but when they studied the question more thoroughly and realized that it is impossible to change the present calendar without moving the day of worship to a different day of the week every year, they voiced their objections and stated that they will be ready to speak out publicly in accordance with their changed belief. This question is not yet understood generally and therefore many favor it until they comprehend just what the change will mean to their own religion.

I say this, because I wish you gentlemen to realize that the protests are not limited to a few small denominations. I sincerely feel that Congress will hear the thanks of millions of citizens in this country when it is realized that we have not permitted the trampling under foot for commercial purposes of that which is considered sacred by so many citizens of our country.

CONSTITUTIONAL OBJECTION

Now, Mr. Speaker, you may be aware of the fact that when this proposal was being discussed before the Foreign Affairs Committee, I suggested that in truth we had no right to be considering the question at all. I sincerely believe that I was correct in my statement at that time, and I wish to reiterate my constitutional objection to the whole proposition.

The following are the four points of order which I presented against this House Joint Resolution 334:

(1) There is no rule of the House of Representatives authorizing the Committee on Foreign Affairs, or any other committee of the House or of the Senate, to report or even consider legislation affecting a change in the calendar.

(2) There is no provision of the Constitution authorizing Congress to legislate on the subject of changing the calendar.

NOTE.—Article X of the Constitution.

(3) Congress is positively forbidden by the Constitution from making any law respecting any establishment of religion or any law that would prohibit the free exercise of religion. Legislation changing the date of the Sabbath surely affects the religion of hundreds of millions of people, and would positively interfere with the free exercise thereof.

(4) There is no power given to Congress by the Constitution to pass any law that will alter or nullify the laws of any State of the Union.

VIOLATION OF STATE RIGHTS

In taking up these four points in the reverse order I wish to emphasize the fact that the Federal Government is not empowered to prescribe changes in the calendar for the States. It could only make its law effective in the District of Columbia, the Territories, and Territorial possessions of the United States. A situation strictly analogous to this is the one in which people speak of national legal holidays, yet realizing well that there are, strictly speaking, no national legal holidays in the United States; not even the Fourth of July.

The Federal Government has no constitutional power to prescribe legal holidays in the various States. It can make holidays legal only in the District of Columbia and in the Territories. Even the presidential proclamation designating a day of thanksgiving each year does not make that day a national legal holiday. For commercial purposes the Federal Government, by various acts of Congress, has recognized Labor Day, Christmas, New Year's Day, Washington's Birthday, Memorial Day, and the Fourth of July as public holidays. That is as far as the Federal Government can go. There is no general statute on the subject. Sometimes the term "national legal holiday" is loosely applied to holidays such as some of those mentioned above, which have been made legal holidays in every State and in the District of Columbia and all the Territories, and which are therefore, in one sense, both national and legal.

STATES NOT OBLIGATED TO ADOPT CHANGE

By analogy the same reasoning will apply to proposed changes in the calendar. Even if the Federal Government should pass the act legalizing the 13-month calendar, not a single State would be under obligation to make the change.

The same situation would apply to any attempt of the Federal Government to reverse the calendar. At the present time each State has the privilege of regulating time in its own way. As a matter of fact the States have in general delegated this privilege to the various municipalities. It is, for instance, a well known fact to all of you that any city can decide whether it shall utilize daylight-saving time or not. By the same token each city could call what is generally known as noon "3 o'clock" or "6 o'clock" or any other time. In other words, Mr. Speaker, the regulation of time is entirely within the jurisdiction of bodies outside of the Federal Government and the latter can do nothing to alter or nullify the laws of any State of the Union.

Some State legislatures have already exercised their power in this calendar question and introduced bills providing for the 13-month calendar. This, however, is folly, because if these States should adopt the new calendar, the worst kind of confusion would result. Different dates, different days of the week and even different months would prevail at the same time.

How would it be, for example, if in New York it would be Tuesday, May 2, and in New Jersey, across the river, the calendar would read Friday, April 27?

NEW YORK'S BILL RECENTLY INTRODUCED

On January 18, 1929, a bill was introduced into the Assembly of the State of New York entitled:

An act amending section 50 of the general construction law as to time, use of standard, making 364 days in one year divided in 13 calendar months of 28 days each.

The bill reads:

SECTION 1. Section fifty of the general construction law is hereby amended to read as follows. Time shall continue to be computed in this state according to the [Gregorian or] new style. The first day of each year after the year [seventeen hundred and fifty-two] nineteen hundred and thirty is the first day of January, according to such style. So that each year shall contain three hundred and sixty-four days divided into thirteen months of twenty-eight days each.

2. Section fifty-seven of this act is hereby repealed.

3. This act shall take effect immediately.

In the State of Oregon a resolution pertaining to this subject was introduced on January 21, 1929.

Mr. Speaker, can you imagine the confusion that would prevail if one of these bills or any bill similar to them were approved by Congress and an attempt was made to have them put into effect?

HISTORY OF CALENDAR CHANGES

I call this to your attention particularly because I wish to emphasize two important facts. On the one hand, it indicates the absolute correctness of my point of order that there is no power given to Congress by the Constitution to pass any law that will alter or nullify the laws of any State of the Union; and also because, if calendar changes were attempted according to the correct method and regulations of State procedure, indescribable confusion would result.

I wish to call your attention now, Mr. Speaker, to the whole situation affected by the calendar changes that are contemplated. You realize, of course, that this is not the first time that so-called improvements to our present method of reckoning time have been suggested. Since time immemorial, men have felt that the current form of calendar was complicated and unwieldy and many attempts were made to improve it. The present method of measuring time is known as the Gregorian calendar, named in honor of Pope Gregory XIII who, in 1582, revised the calendar. He came as near perfection as is possible, I believe.

NOT AN EASY TASK

To devise a calendar adapted to the needs of mankind is not an easy task. It must contain the day, the month, and the year which are natural divisions measured by alternating light and darkness, by the waxing and waning of the moon, and by the recurring seasons. The difficulty of harmonizing these elements is at once apparent when it is considered that the number of days in a month or year, or of months in a year, in each case includes a fraction.

The sidereal day, or time of a complete rotation of the earth on its axis, as measured by the apparent passage of the fixed stars, is a constant period, and subject to no changes that man can discover. It is 3 minutes and 55.909435 seconds shorter than the mean or average solar days, so that it would not do for a standard day because its beginning would, in the course of the year, have occupied every hour of the natural day.

The solar day is measured by the apparent passage of the sun from the meridian of one day to the meridian of the next. The duration of this day is affected by the elliptical orbit of the earth, the inclination of its axis, and the perturbations of the planets. Though subject to fluctuations from these causes, observation has determined that year to year a constant average of length is maintained. This average or mean solar day has been adopted as the unit or standard of astronomical and civil time, and is arbitrarily divided into 24 hours and subdivided into minutes and seconds. Observation has shown that the noon or meridian of a natural or solar day may occur 14½ minutes sooner, or 16½ minutes later than midday of mean solar or common clock time.

YEAR ALSO SUBJECT TO CHANGE

The solar year is also subject to slight changes caused by the attraction of other planets, hence the mean solar year has been adopted as a standard to which the calendar must conform as nearly as possible. Its length has been found to be 365.24224 days, which being fractional requires the addition of a day from time to time to the year of 365 days to keep the seasons in the same portion of the calendar.

Our present calendar is a growth, which may be traced back to 738 B. C., when Romulus introduced the Roman calendar, in which the year comprised 304 days, divided into 10 months, described as follows: March, the first month, was named in honor of Mars, the god of war. The name of the second month, April, was derived from aperire, to open, as the month in which the earth opened for new fruit. May, the third month, was so called in honor of Maia, the goddess of marriages. Quintilis was then the fifth month, Sextilis the sixth, our September the seventh, October the eighth, November the ninth, and December the tenth. During the reign of Julius Cæsar Quintilis was changed to July at the suggestion of Mark Antony and subsequently Cæsar Augustus, not to be outdone by Julius, gave the place of Sextilis to August.

But this year of 304 days did not agree with the solar year of 365 days or the lunar year of 354 days, nor did it recur at any fixed season. In 713 B. C., to correct this error, Numa Pompilius added two months—January and February—to the year, fixing its beginning at the winter solstice. This made the year consist of 354 days, or 12 lunar months, to which an additional one was added every two or three years. As Numa's calendar was not based on a knowledge of the true length of the year, the error arising from it accumulated as the years went by and began to confuse the seasons. In Julius Cæsar's time, for example, spring came about the 1st of January.

REFORMED BY CÆSAR

This confusion lead to the reformation of the calendar by Cæsar in the year 46 B. C. Sosigenes, an Alexandrian astronomer and mathematician, was sent for, who made calculations showing there was a discrepancy of about 80 days in the old reckoning. Cæsar then decreed that the year 46 B. C. should have 445 days, and that the year 45 B. C. should commence on the first day of the new moon following the winter solstice, which date was to be the 1st day of January. The year 46 B. C. with its 445 days was well named "the year of confusion." In the Julian calendar thus established, each fourth year was known as a leap-year or bissextile, because, instead of adding an extra day to February, as we do now, the 25th day of February was duplicated.

The error in the Julian calendar is (365.25—365.24224) 0.00776 of a day per year, and in 129 years it would amount to one day. In 1582 the error from this and other causes amounted to 10 days. Pope Gregory XIII undertook to rectify the error. After consulting with ecclesiastics, princes, and mathematicians, the plan finally adopted was that proposed by the astronomer Luilius, and in accordance therewith a brief was issued decreeing that after October 4, 1582, 10 days should be omitted, so that the next day should be the 15th instead of the 5th.

THE CHANGE TO THE GREGORIAN

The following illustration shows clearly the change from the Julian to the Gregorian calendar.

1582 A. D.		OCTOBER				1582 A. D.
Sun.	Mon.	Tue.	Wed.	Thu.	Fri.	Sat.
	1	2	3	4	15	16

24	25	26	27	28	29	30
31

The above proves that the change did not interfere in any way with the continuity of the days of the week or the free running week. The change was adopted by Spain, Portugal, and Italy as decreed by Gregory XIII, on Friday, October 5, 1582. Instead of writing Friday the 5th, they wrote the 15th. It made no break in the weekly cycle, only in the dates of the month when the 10 days were dropped out. The next day after the change was effected was Saturday, but this Saturday became the 16th instead of the 6th of October.

FRANCE ADOPTS CHANGE

France waited till December of the same year, 1582, and it adopted the change in the calendar by calling the 10th of December the 20th, as indicated below:

1582 A. D.		DECEMBER				1582 A. D.
Sun.	Mon.	Tue.	Wed.	Thu.	Fri.	Sat.
			1	2	3	4
5	6	7	8	9	20	21
22	23	24	25	26	27	28
29	30	31

Again it will be noticed that the continuity of week days or the running week was not disrupted when France dropped the 10 days out of her calendar in the month of December. The change was again made on Friday, but it was Friday the 20th instead of Friday the 10th. The dates of the month were changed but not the days of the weekly cycle.

ADOPTED BY ENGLAND IN 1752

England and her colonies adopted the Gregorian calendar 170 years later, in 1752. By that time it was necessary to drop 11 days instead of 10 days. An act of Parliament stated that September 3 should be called September 14. The change was made on a Thursday, as the following illustrates:

1752 A. D.		SEPTEMBER				1752 A. D.
Sun.	Mon.	Tue.	Wed.	Thu.	Fri.	Sat.
		1	2	14	15	16
17	18	19	20	21	22	23
24	25	26	27	28	29	30

The above chart explains why we celebrate George Washington's Birthday on February 22, although he was born on February 11. The dropping of 11 days in the calendar during his lifetime makes that difference of 11 days.

England and her colonies (and at that time the United States was a British colony) in dropping out the 11 days again preserved the weekly cycle as all previous nations had done who adopted the Gregorian calendar. The 2d of September was followed by the 14th, and everybody in the English possessions wrote Thursday, September 14, 1752, instead of Thursday, September 3. The date of the month was changed but not the day of the week. The 2d of September was Wednesday, and the next day was Thursday, the 14th of September. It would have been Thursday in either case, whether the change had been made or not. All these changes which were made by different nations at different times did not in a single instance disarrange the weekly cycle between the nations which changed from the Julian calendar to the Gregorian and those which did not. The days of the week were the same in each nation after the change was made as they were before. The dates of the month were different but not the days of the week.

GREECE WAITED 341 YEARS

Turkey, Russia, Rumania, Serbia, and Greece continued using the Julian calendar until just a few years ago. Turkey adopted the Gregorian calendar in 1917, Soviet Russia in 1918, Rumania and Serbia in 1919, and Greece in 1923. Greece had waited just 341 years before it adopted the Gregorian calendar. By this time it became necessary to drop 13 days out of the reckoning. The following calendar shows how it affected the monthly dates and how the days of the week were preserved intact in dropping the 13 days out of the reckoning.

Greece made the change on a Sunday, and instead of calling it Sunday, October 1 according to the Julian calendar, the Greeks called it Sunday, October 14, according to the Gregorian calendar. They went to sleep on Saturday night, September 30, according to the Julian calendar, and woke up Sunday morning, October 14, according to the Gregorian. Dropping the 13 days did not alter the days of the week but only the dates of the month of October. In all the changes made in the calendar by all the nations, care was taken to preserve the continuity of the weekly cycle.

NO CASE WHERE DAY WAS SKIPPED

I have deliberately gone into detail to show you that in all past changes of the calendar there has been no case where a day was "skipped." When people look superficially at the history of the calendar changes they may get the impression that the Julian transformation or the Gregorian adjustment necessitated a change in succession of the days of the week. But that this is an erroneous impression I must stress again, because so many important newspapers criticized me when I opposed the Eastman plan.

For instance, the Washington Post had an editorial on December 31, 1928, which is typical of the misapprehension of other editors. I would ask you to observe in the following editorial how different the recitation of so-called facts are from the presentation which I have just given you involving the history of the calendar changes. The Post editorial of that date read as follows:

CALENDAR CHANGES

Representative SOL BLOOM, of New York, has taken the lead in the opposition that is developing toward the adoption of a simplified calendar. He says that the reformed calendar would prevent the fixed recurrence of Sundays and certain religious holidays and "would mean utter chaos" for Jews, Christians, Mohammedans, and others. "There are certain difficulties in our present system of timekeeping which should be eliminated," he says, "and I am heartily in favor of having the President take the initiative now in calling an international conference with this in view. However, the substitute plan for a new calendar which is now broached by Mr. George Eastman, of Rochester, is a proposal which I must resist."

Mr. BLOOM's objection centers in the so-called zero days—days that would be assigned to no month, but which must be inserted into the new calendar for the purpose of making it synchronize with the solar year. A zero day once a year, he asserts, would serve to move the true Sabbath back one day each year. In 1933, the year it is planned to put the new calendar into effect, the Jewish Sabbaths would fall as they should, on Saturdays, but in 1934 they would fall on Friday.

If the present calendar is to be looked upon as accurately registering true days of the week, there is much to be said in favor of Mr. BLOOM'S argument. Consideration of its history, however, leads to the conclusion that the present calendar does not register true days.

Julius Cæsar, in B. C. 45, reformed the Roman calendar so that thereafter every fourth year should contain 366 days, and all other years 365 days. The intercalary day was introduced by counting twice the sixth day before the kalends of March. He also changed the beginning of the year from the first day of March to the first of January. The average length of the Julian year is therefore 365¼ days, which, however, is too long by 11 minutes and 14 seconds. This would accumulate in 400 years to about three days. In A. D. 1582, the Gregorian calendar was introduced by Pope Gregory XIII, with the view of keeping the equinox to the same day of the year. Only such centurial years as were thenceforward divisible by 400 contained 366 days.

The length of the mean Gregorian year, therefore, may be set down at 365 days, 5 hours, 49 minutes and 12 seconds, and the discrepancy amounts to but one day in 3,000 years. The Gregorian calendar was not accepted by England and her colonies until 1752, when the rule for Easter Day was established and the equinox occurred on March 21. September 3, 1752, was called September 14, and at the same time the commencement of the legal year was changed from March 25 to January 1, so that the year 1751 lost the months of January and February and the first 24 days of March. The Gregorian calendar was not adopted by Turkey until 1917, by the Soviet until 1918, by Rumania until 1919, and by Greece and the Greek Church until 1923.

Jews and Christians marked their religious days by the faulty Julian calendar through many years after the more reliable Gregorian calendar had been introduced. But even the latter is not perfect. Because of the error it contains, it does not register true days, and even though the error is almost infinitesimal it stands in the same light as the so-called zero day contemplated in the Eastman calendar.

There is no reason to assume that there is, or could be, such a thing as a "true" day of the week. After all, particularly in view of the several upheavals the present calendar has survived, the celebration of certain days apart from others is governed by custom and tradition. The new calendar would not affect the celebration of religious holidays any more than the Gregorian calendar did. Even under the calendar now in use it will be necessary ultimately to insert an extra day for the purpose of "catching up," which would have just as much effect upon recurring religious holidays as the so-called zero day to which Mr. BLOOM objects.

NO CHANGES AFFECTED THE DAY OF THE WEEK

Mr. Speaker, if you have followed me carefully in my earlier presentation it will be unnecessary for me to point out again the mistake which was made in this editorial and which is so commonly made by others. The claim that "the present calendar does not register true days of the week" and that the changes made in the calendar by Julius Cæsar and by Pope Gregory XIII "stand in the same light as the so-called zero day contemplated in the Eastman calendar" are clearly unfounded. All historic and astronomical facts bear proof that none of the changes made at any time in the calendar by Ptolemy, Julius Cæsar, Augustus Cæsar, or Pope Gregory XIII affected the days of the weekly cycle but only the days of the months and the days of the yearly cycle. As reliable an authority as the Encyclopedia Brittanica states (page 664 in article called "Calendar," under "Week"):

The week is a period of seven days, having no reference whatever to the celestial motions—a circumstance to which it owes its unalterable uniformity. Although it did not enter into the calendar of the Greeks, and was not introduced at Rome till after the reign of Theodosius, it has been employed from time immemorial in almost all eastern countries—and those who reject the mosaic recital will be at a loss, as Delambre remarks, to assign to it an origin having much semblance of probability.

The days of the weekly cycle have never been disturbed in any calendar changes which have been made. The Jewish race which has been strict in its observance of the seventh day Sabbath as long as history can recall, has never altered its observance of the Sabbath day on the seventh day of the week.

The proposed blank-day plan in the Eastman calendar, as submitted in the resolution I am now discussing, is the first plan that ever suggested a change in the weekly cycle. This plan would make the Sabbath day as well as Sunday a migratory day through the weekly cycle each year, and would in reality make the holy days, which are now definitely fixed, merely fictitious days, robbed of their original religious significance.

QUOTES NEW TESTAMENT

This is not a notion limited to Jewish acceptance. The New Testament states that Jesus rose "upon the first day of the week," and that the day preceding His resurrection was "the Sabbath day according to the commandment." If the day before "the first day of the week" was "the Sabbath day according to the commandment" which God anciently delivered to His people and which the Jewish race has continuously observed, we have positive proof that the present seventh day of the week is the same seventh day of the week it was at the time of Jesus, and as it was at the time the fourth commandment was included in the decalogue at Mount Sinai.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the question may have arisen in your mind as to just what differences it will make whether the religious Sabbath is observed on one day of the week or another. In my opinion the measuring of time is not important in itself, but, because of what it involves in our lives.

To have any value a calendar must possess, above all things, the virtue of continuity.

The calendar which omits an occasional day or two, obviously, is worthless for the primary purpose for which a calendar was devised—a means of reckoning time accurately.

True, the omitted day is not literally lost. The sun rises and sets. The hours pass. We live that period.

IT REALLY IS A LOST DAY

Yet, if the calendar disregards it, it is a lost day in so far as that calendar is concerned. The very fact that such a day has passed and that we have failed to count it, throws all our chronological calculations, past and future, into confusion.

The third day from any given event is the third day, even though we refuse to recognize the intervening day, and call the third day the second. Just so with every succeeding day.

All of which might seem a superfluous line of reasoning, were it not for the fact that a new calendar is offered to us—indeed, it is proposed to force it upon us by world-wide legislative enactment—which would create precisely the situation suggested above.

It is a proposal, too, not lacking in certain plausibility, at first glance. On closer examination, I believe that its inherent inconsistencies speak for themselves.

The most apparent of the difficulties the proposed new system of chronological reckoning must involve is in its application to our everyday affairs.

MANY WOULD REFUSE TO ACCEPT CHANGE

If, for example, we live through a week of time—Sunday, Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday—and on Saturday night raise the question, "What day do we observe next, as Sunday," the natural answer is, "To-morrow"—and it will be very difficult to convince most of us that "to-morrow" is a "zero" day, and that Monday is Sunday, and should be observed accordingly.

In fact, it does not strain the imagination to assume that great numbers of devout observers of the Christian "Lord's Day" will refuse to be convinced—that they will continue to observe as Sunday the same day that they have been taught to regard as Sunday, from the dawn of the Christian era, and to treat Monday as Monday and the rest of the days of the week as they always have treated them since the memory of man runneth not to the contrary.

Supporting legislation to rearrange—or disarrange—the calendar, in all probability simply will add to the situation's difficulties, by giving official sanction to a chronological change of such character as to render western civilization's day of worship a variable date, drifting ever backward through each succeeding week as the years elapse—and why? For a matter of commercial convenience, or hoped-for convenience.

WANDERING SABBATHS

The variableness of Easter has long been recognized as an inconvenience, not only from the standpoint of the Christian churches, but as a commercial proposition as well.

What, then, shall we say of a "Wandering Sabbath," or a "Floating Lord's Day," not once a twelve-month, as in the case of Easter, but weekly throughout the year?

To be sure, the calendar "reformers" aim at the "stabilization" of a new Sunday, under their plan.

To create a real "day of worship," however, requires more than a law. We may set it down as a foregone conclusion that no mere act of Congress—or even an international convention—setting up an artificial Sunday, will be acceptable to literal-minded religionists.

Probably it would be acceptable enough to a considerable element of people who—without implying any reflection upon them—are not so strict in their interpretation of rules of orthodoxy. These doubtless would feel that one day of rest and of worship in seven is satisfactory, without insisting upon any particular day in the week for its observance.

GENERAL ACQUIESCENCE ESSENTIAL

Just how public sentiment would be divided in so peculiar a situation is purely a matter of surmise. At any rate, it is a safe prediction that the number of dissenters from any system calling for a changeable Sabbath would be formidable. It might be a majority. It might be only a large minority, but even a minority would frustrate the so-called "reform."

General acquiescence to the plan is essential to its success—Christian acquiescence at least. The Jews never have abandoned Saturday as their holy day. The Seventh-day Adventists and the Seventh-day Baptists never have abandoned theirs. Friday has continued to be the Mohammedan day of worship throughout the centuries.

Relatively, the country over, the Jews are not a large group in the United States. The Seventh-day Adventists and the Seventh-day Baptists are fewer yet. Of Mohammedans America has only a handful.

The great numerical preponderance in our country favors one and the same weekly day of worship and of rest.

Disciples of the Cross hitherto have been almost a unit in accepting as their Sabbath the day which virtually the whole of Christianity has accepted for well-nigh two thousand years.

Public regulations can be prescribed—and have been prescribed—and made tolerably effective throughout the land—for the respect, if not the religious observance, of the Lord's Day upon which the overwhelming majority of a vast population are agreed.

With us Sunday is a day of rest even to those to whom a different day is holy as a matter of creed.

WOULD DOOM SUNDAYS

Shatter this general recognition by sundering the Christian churches into two great opposing camps on the question of their holy day, and how long would a single day continue to be regarded by all the people as a day apart and entitled to especial reverence?

I think it goes almost without saying that the large-scale observance of dual Sundays would mean the final observance of no Sunday at all.

Let us examine the calendar "reformers'" plan in detail. Briefly, the proposal is this.

Beginning with 1933, when the first day of January and the first day of the week, Sunday, would coincide, the reformers would initiate a year of thirteen 28-day months, plus one additional day, to make up the full annual quota of 365.

This 365th day is to be added as the last of the year—a part of no week and of no month, or it would upset the exact coordination of all week days with their invariably corresponding days of the month—a vital principle of the reformers' scheme.

THE 365TH DAY BECOMES A CIPHER

A zero day! a lost day! Into each fourth year (leap year) an additional "skip day" is to be inserted, between June and Sol—a day, like the annually recurring 365th day of the year, to be ignored in the proposed new calendar's count of days—and yet to be allowed for in point of time, in conformity with the commercially inconvenient but nevertheless unalterable length of the solar year.

What follows? Under the new system, day succeeds day in normal sequence up to and including the 364th, but the 365th is a cipher—no day at all in the record of the "reformed" calendar. This 365th day, in its place at the end of the initial "reformed year," is, in fact, Sunday. We may safely assume that all strictly orthodox Christians would observe it accordingly. To these orthodox folks the following day would be Monday, but Sunday to those who have accepted the reformed method as their new rule. Yet they can hardly expect their fellow Christians, who have observed the preceding day, to observe a second Sabbath with them. The same confusion would prevail throughout the year. During the ensuing year the official Saturday would be Sunday to the orthodox; the next year Friday; the next Thursday, and so on, with additional complications resulting from the quadrennial mid-year "skip day."

ULTIMATELY THE SUNDAYS WOULD COINCIDE

Ultimately the orthodox Sunday would retrogress through the week until it and the official Sunday fall upon the same day, but other dates would have become almost hopelessly jumbled in the meantime, and even this coincidence of the two Sundays would continue but a year, when the orthodox holy day's backward movement toward the official week's beginning is resumed. The situation is hard to understand, as described. In practice it would be abundantly worse.

The reformers contend that their plan's uniformity would be of untold commercial advantage. The business statistician would be able to compare his figures for any desired month with the figures for any other month in any other year in the full certainty that the pair of months are identical in every respect.

QUESTION OF ENFORCEMENT

This theory might be sound if the statistician could enforce the adoption of his reformed calendar upon those who, as a matter of religious conviction, may prefer to adhere to the holy day of their fathers—which, however, of course, he can not do, no matter how effective he may make it in civil law. His records can scarcely be simplified by the addition to his problem of one or two or three weekly "floating Sundays."

Aside from the religious difficulty, it is an open question as to how well the public would be satisfied with the complete dislocation of the world chronology of all historic events—with the confusion of all dates, anniversaries, Independence Days and other occasions, past and future, beyond the power of anyone but an expert mathematician ever to determine exactly again.

Suffice it to say that the experiment was tried in the early days of the French Revolution—largely with the deliberate intent of breaking with the past—and that the "reformed calendar" of that time survived but a few months, so cumbersome and inconvenient did it prove.

More to the point, as a problem in practical affairs, is the fact that a new interpretation of every outstanding bit of commercial paper and legal document, in which the time element is involved, must accompany the proposed calendar change.

THE REFORMERS' PROGRAM

A congressional resolution—already pending—requesting the President to take action toward an international conference! The conference itself, under the League of Nations' direction! The adoption of a definite plan and of a date for putting it into effect!

Such is the "reformers'" program.

And then, as expressed in a booklet, "Do We Need Calendar Reform?" by George Eastman, the scheme's chief American proponent, nothing would remain but "the ratifying legislation in the various countries."

Mr. Eastman adds:

> Such legislation, which would be of a very simple nature, would take care of the changes in dates of holidays, the maturity dates of contracts, and other legal matters.

It does not look so simple to the League of Nations.

According to a report of the league's special committee of inquiry into the reform of the calendar:

> No reform can be effected without the consent of all, or almost all, the important bodies interested, and these cover a wide range—religious, administrative, economic, and scientific, for example. It rests with public opinion to judge of the merits and the practicability of each of these groups of systems. The committee does not believe that it is as yet possible to obtain sufficiently definite statements of the final views of those interested.

HAS GOVERNMENT THE POWER?

Also "legal matters," as perhaps Mr. Eastman overlooks, are matters for the individual 48 States. It is exceedingly doubtful whether or not the Federal Government has the power to commit them to such a revision of their own laws as would be necessitated by "calendar reform" along the lines proposed.

In short, the issue clearly becomes constitutional.

It is highly improbable that a mere congressional ratification of a "calendar reform" program, requiring so radical a readjustment as the one we are now being urged to adopt, would stand the Supreme Court test.

A constitutional amendment would seem imperative.

Calendar simplification perhaps is desirable—but not at the sacrifice of a literal tossing out of days.

The end could be attained by means of a year of thirteen 28-day months, with an accumulation of the odd three hundred and sixty-fifth days until, at the end of each twenty-third yearly period, enough of them would be available, including the leap-year surplusage, to add a fourteenth month to that year, thus bringing the solar starting point again back to standard.

RESTS WITH PUBLIC OPINION

On such a basis there would be a slight shifting of the seasons during the 23 yearly intervals, it is true, but it would not be considerable, and the continuity of the count of days, at all events, would not be interrupted, as contemplated in the so-called Eastman plan which we are being urged to adopt now.

In the last analysis, as the League of Nations committee justly says, "It rests with public opinion to judge."

We have heard from the "experts" at length.

It is time that we heard from the public before attempting, at the instance of a few commercial statisticians, to thrust so radical a change upon the country and upon the world.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, I insist that public opinion be considered in this important move for if it is considered no rash step will be taken. By public opinion I do not mean casual or flippant remarks, such as are easily passed concerning a new calendar. A well-known columnist insists that the new 13-month calendar idea will surely fail, because "what we need is fewer firsts of the month rather than more." The truth of that situation does not detract from its humor. People do hate bills.

CALENDAR CHANGE IN CHINA CAUSES FUROR

Nor do I rely for public opinion upon the opposition which will be offered to any change in the calendar such as has been faced in countries like China and even Russia. Yet this public opinion of hundreds of millions of people must be considered, because a change in the calendar is a very vital matter. Only recently the Government of China changed the calendar to the one commonly known among us and the natives are said to be having a terrible time. The lunar calendar which has 12 months but differs somewhat from ours has been used in former centuries. The Chinese Government insists on adopting our western calendar in order to have the same chronology in China that is used now by civilized nations throughout the world.

That is reasonable. But because of the change in reckoning the months there has resulted a dreadful mix up in birthdays and other festivals. Birthdays are very important in China, and the natives do not see how they are ever going to know by the new calendar when they were born and celebrate their anniversaries properly.

They can doubtless learn that in time. And then just as they have got it all worked out the proposal for the 13-month calendar will confront them and they will again be bewildered and upset.

Mr. Speaker, you may be interested in a very important demonstration almost before our eyes as to the effect which a change of calendar has upon great populations.

Popular demonstrations against adoption of the Gregorian calendar, which would mean observance of Easter on March 31 this year instead of May 5, took place at several places in Rumania.

PEASANTS UP IN ARMS

In Bucharest groups of angry churchgoers gathered in front of the patriarch's palace and demanded the return of the old Byzantine calendar. In Bessarabia unlettered but devout peasants charged that the Government had deliberately changed the date of Easter to March 31, because that day coincides with the Jewish Passover. In many Bessarabian towns the peasants threatened to boycott the church if the new calendar was enforced.

There was some concern expressed in Cabinet circles, members of the Government fearing that the outbursts might assume a violent form. Juliu Maniu, Prime Minister, who is seeking to bring Rumania into harmony with western Europe in every possible way, has decided to let the Holy Synod and the churches fight out the dispute.

The Synod in Bucharest held that it must enforce the new calendar. It took the ground that a decision it had formally made was not revisable.

Some of the ecclesiastical authorities, including the Bishop of Bessarabia, fear that the situation may lead to an open schism in the Rumanian national church.

Rumania is not darkest Africa but an important member of the European family of nations, and if such difficulties are faced there with a minor change of only one festival, just picture to yourself what utter confusion would occur and what outbreaks and schisms might appear if a violent and radical change such as the proposed 13-month calendar were forced upon that and other nations.

WILBUR WARNED OF CHANGE

Former Secretary Curtis Wilbur, of the Navy Department, fully realized how serious any change of the calendar might be when he declared on July 8, 1924—

Whatever changes might be made in the calendar should be delayed for several years after adoption in order that the labor of preparing data for the ephemeris and nautical almanac, which data fix predicted positions of heavenly bodies years in advance of their application, shall not be lost, and that the labor and expense of revision and recalculation shall be avoided.

THIS IS THE YEAR 1933—NOT 1929!

Mr. Speaker, the difficulty of calendar change has been realized for many years. If it had not been for the very apparent complications involved, another change in the calendar—a very simple one—would have been made long ago. I refer to the fact that all scientific authorities know that this is not the year 1929 but the year of 1933 or 1934! Christian scholars and scientific students know now, and have known for a long time, that Jesus was born, not in the year we call 1 A. D. but four or five years earlier. Yet why has there been no attempt to change our calendar so that this will be the year 1933? I believe you will agree that it is because authorities have foreseen the great difficulties that would be faced in the revision of so many dates, anniversaries, celebrations, legal documents, and important festivals. No effort has been made to adjust the date of the Christian era because of the inconvenience that would necessarily follow.

This is proof positive of the fact that calendar changes are very serious matters. Remember that this change would be a minor one that would not affect anything but the name and number of the year. Picture how much more involved the situation would become if the months, days, weeks were affected, and in addition a "blank day" were piled on the top of the confusion.

AUTHORITIES DIFFER

When I mentioned this mistake in the year of the Christian era to a number of my friends and colleagues they thought I was exaggerating or stating an unfounded fact. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I will refer anyone who is in doubt as to the authenticity of my statement to the most reliable sources on Christian history and fact.

From Haydn's Dictionary of Dates and Universal Information, page 54:

Anno Domini, A. D., the year of Our Lord, of Grace, of the Incarnation, of the Circumcision, and the Crucifixion. The Christian era commenced 1 Jan. in the middle of the 4th year of the 194th Olympiad, the 753rd year of the building of Rome, and in 4714 of the Julian period. This era was invented by a monk, Dionysius Exiguus, about 532. It was introduced into Italy in the 6th century, and ordered to be used by bishops by the council of Chelsea, in 816, but was not generally employed for several centuries. Charles III, of Germany, was the first who added "in the year of our Lord" to his reign in 879. It is held that Christ was probably born in the year 4 or 5.

International Encyclopedia, volume 12, page 659:

Jesus was born in the 6th or 7th year before the Christian Era toward the close of the Reign of Herod the Great.

Encyclopedia Americana, volume 16, page 41, column 2, near bottom:

The date of his [Jesus] birth can not be given with certainty as to day, month, or year. Since it must be somewhat preceded the death of Herod (April, 4 B. C.) it probably occurred some time in the year 5 B. C. (possibly 6).

International Standard Bible Encyclopedia, page 1628:

The birth of Jesus may be placed with probability in the latter part of B. C., the ordinary dating of the commencement of the Christian era, being thus, as is generally recognized, four years too late.

Our whole calendar is therefore wrong; and yet no one has attempted to correct this error, because it would bring about unnecessary confusion. The same applies to the whole effort of calendar reform, except that the difficulties are magnified a hundred times.

KANSAS SITUATION

The Members of the House will be interested in the very singular fact that the Legislature of the State of Kansas was in a peculiar position at the beginning of this year and that the situation has some bearing on the 13-month calendar we are now discussing. In fact, some people have urged as an argument in favor of universal adoption of the 13-month year the dilemma in which Kansas found itself on January 1 last.

The constitution of Kansas provides that the legislature shall assemble on the second Tuesday in January and that the governor shall be inaugurated on the second Monday in January, intending to have the legislature assemble the day after the governor is sworn in. But January 1, 1929, falls on Tuesday, so the second Tuesday in the month is January 8; but the first Monday is January 7 and the second Monday does not arrive until January 14. Thus the legislature would be in session six days before the governor was inaugurated.

Therefore, say some, let us have a 13-month year, in which such things can not happen!

The editor of the Baltimore Sun made a very interesting comment on the suggestion that we ought to have a 13-month year in order to prevent the recurrence of such mishaps.

But why? If some maker of the Kansas constitution had had a pencil and a piece of paper he could have figured out in a very few minutes the inevitability of such happenings.

To make the whole world change its calendar because Kansas can't perform simple calculations seems a great deal for Kansas to ask.

WOULD WORK HARM TO MANY

All kinds of arguments have been offered in favor of the 13-month calendar, running from the ridiculous to the sublime. We, who oppose the innovation and who claim that there is no great public demand for so serious and radical a transformation, could point out scores of reasons why the 13-month calendar would work to the disadvantage and harm of many individuals and many large groups.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether the proponents of the 13-month plan realize that under their scheme public-utility corporations would be compelled to have meters read and bills rendered thirteen times a year instead of twelve. This is no small matter, for it would add 8 per cent to the cost of this single item and every business man knows that 8 per cent is a margin not to be disregarded. Do they realize the mounting cost of printing magazines and the additional costs of advertisements which would inevitably result because of the necessity of publishing monthly magazines thirteen times a year instead of twelve? This one item alone would mean millions of dollars of added expense to the general public, and yet the defenders of the 13-month plan claim the 13-month calendar would bring economy into business.

RENT THIRTEEN TIMES A YEAR

Rent payers would note the disadvantage of the new plan very quickly, for they would have to pay the cost of their homes or apartments thirteen times a year. Of course, the proponents of the plan claim salaries would be adjusted accordingly, but I know very well that salaries are slow to follow when the cost of living mounts. Here too, there will be the added cost of making 13 rent collections instead of 12.

Mr. Speaker, has it been brought to the attention of those who favor the change of our calendar that if their plan were accepted it would become necessary to change every textbook, every encyclopedia, every record, and all histories? The cost would run to hundreds of millions of dollars. Where, I ask, is the corresponding economy that the advocates of this plan boast about?

We must also bear in mind the question of long-term leases and contracts that are in existence at the present time. You will agree with me, if you consider this matter from a legal standpoint, that it taxes the imagination to conceive how tremendous the amount of litigation will be when these leases and contracts are challenged because of the change of calendar dates.

LEASES WOULD BE INVALIDATED

Real estate leases would be invalidated on a wholesale scale. Throughout the country generally a form of lease known as "ground lease," or "99-year lease," is very prevalent. In practically all of these instruments, the rental is reserved on a monthly payment basis, and the entire amount due for the full period of the lease lumped under a direct promise of the lessee to pay that amount, but in monthly installments.

The courts would indeed be confronted with a herculean task in construing these leases. If the courts hold that the leases were executed while the old calendar was in force and with it in mind, the new calendar will be entirely disregarded so far as the terms of the lease are concerned.

Under this construction the parties to the lease and their successors will be required to keep alive for nearly a hundred years an anniversary date of the old calendar so as to make payments in accordance therewith. The practical effect, therefore, is to nullify the new calendar as a working basis for time computation.

AMBIGUITY WOULD ARISE IN LEASES

On the other hand, if the courts should hold that these leases must be made to conform to the legislative enactment establishing the new calendar, then a patent ambiguity will arise upon the faces of the leases for the total amount of rent so calculated on a 12-months-to-the-year basis, and the addition of an extra month will make two clauses of the lease utterly irreconcilable.

If it is held that the provision requiring a definite amount to be paid each month prevails over the total amount stated in the lease, then it must follow that the law creating the new calendar is unconstitutional for it violates the obligation of contract and imposes upon the lessee a higher rental than he had agreed to pay.

Employment contracts, and in fact all contracts under which compensation or payment is now fixed on a monthly basis, would be seriously jeopardized by the new calendar and their validity brought into serious question.

COURTS WOULD BE SWAMPED

A very serious legal question would arise over the application of the various statutes of limitation. In most cases the law requires that an action must be filed in a given number of years after its accrual, but if the cause of action accrued under the old calendar, who could say just when it was barred under the new? Verily, the courts will have a prodigious task to fit this calendar into the fabric of our social organization.

The proponents of the Eastman calendar argue that it has economic value through the stabilization of monthly payments. But this so-called advantage is theoretical rather than actual. Suppose February is a short month and March a long one. Do not the two equalize each other?

Then, too, there are the trusts and investments and foundations which have been tied up legally with stipulated dates and length of terms that would become too involved for unraveling. I could speak to you for hours about the legal complications and the possible litigation which would follow, were the 13-month calendar adopted.

WORKS BOTH WAYS

If the employer must pay the same wage for 28 days in February that he does for 31 days in March, then it is equally true that he may lease his land for the same amount for the short month as for the long one. Throughout the year the inequality in the months' length equalizes itself, and no one is the loser.

On the other hand, very serious economic consequences would result from adoption of the new calendar. Employers would be quick to cut wages of persons employed on a monthly basis, arguing that the new wage should be not more than twelve-thirteenths of the old, but landlords would be very slow to make a similar reduction in rent, and the monthly wage earner would be indeed between two millstones, with a lessened income and an increased living expense. Other and far-reaching economic upheavals would result.

Furthermore, suppose that some or all the European countries do not adopt the new calendar. Picture the confusion which would result in attempting to reconcile June 17 under the old calendar abroad with June 28 in the United States, bearing in mind that there would be no definite number of days between the two dates but that they would vary for every month in the year and for every day in every month.

WHY NOT ADOPT THE METRIC SYSTEM?

Again, let me ask why the calendar must needs receive this drastic overhauling at this time? If some reform is needed, why not direct the attention of the Congress to our obsolete method of weights and measures, which could be replaced by the metric system, now in almost universal use abroad, and which would greatly aid our manufacturers in supplying products to countries where that system is in vogue? There would be a change fraught with no sentimental disadvantages and would result in great economic good. In any event it seems certain that the calendar which has stood in its present form for over 150 years and in substantially its present form for nearly 500 years should not be torn apart to achieve some doubtful advantage.

The advocates of the Eastman plan are constantly speaking of the economic advantages and scientific benefits of the new proposal. I, on the other hand, see additional economic disadvantages and even stumbling blocks placed in the way of bookkeeping and accounting. Remember that they point out that "all months have the same number of working days, Saturdays, and Sundays, and are directly comparable," also "each month has the same number of whole weeks. Fractions of the month ends are eliminated."

NO BOON TO BOOKKEEPING

Mr. Speaker, almost every business enterprise is accustomed to making reports either semiannually, quarterly, or every two or four months. I am sure you have already noticed that the figure 13 is not divisible by 2, 3, 4, or 6. Our 12-month plan provides for a very simple method of reporting every 2, 3, 4, or 6 months, because 12 is divisible by each of these numbers. This is an important item and can not be waved aside as a mere technicality. They are arguing in favor of "better accounting methods" and are adopting something which will immediately trap them in every attempt at better accounting.

Not only is it impossible to divide a 13-month year into quarters of even months, but it can not possibly be divided into quarters containing a whole number of weeks. This is even more serious than the difficulty of monthly divisions. I can not see any way that the proponents of the plan can argue against this unsurmountable difficulty in bookkeeping, and I challenge them to point out an efficient way of rendering a quarterly or semiannual report such as can be rendered under our present schedule.

MAKES BUSINESS MORE COMPLICATED

Likewise, instead of making bookkeeping more efficient and decreasing the amount necessary, the new plan would make necessary 13 business closings instead of 12, involving increased bookkeeping in every single enterprise.

The advocates of the Eastman plan are seeking to make business more efficient, and yet if their plan were adopted there would be more confusion in business than ever before. There would always be the necessity of comparing the 13-month year with the 12-month year, which would be extremely complicated. In general, a greater number of adjustments in comparing past statistics and dates than would be required in the 12-month system under which we live.

SUPERSTITION OF "13" DISREGARDED

You notice, Mr. Speaker, that I pay no attention to the fact that the new calendar is based on the number "13," for I disregard completely the superstition surrounding that number. Many scientists who favor the 13-month calendar have attempted to belittle our opposition to their plan by maintaining that this opposition is based on superstition. I believe that the vast majority of those who oppose the calendar change are too intelligent to allow superstition to stand in the way of progress, if it could be proven that the change would really benefit the world. Neither am I horrified by the thought that the 13-month plan provides that every month shall have a "Friday, the 13th." Friday, the 13th, has no terrors for me, and I do not care to use such arguments in the defense of our attitude. By the same token, I object to having the proponents of the plan attribute our opposition to fear of change or superstition. I am giving you real reasons and pointing out actual disadvantages which I can now picture as I consider the possible workings of the new plan as proposed in the Eastman calendar.

Mr. Speaker, I mentioned before that the proposed calendar would cause great confusion and involve much unhappiness by eliminating sacred and personal anniversaries. Permit me to elucidate or enlarge on this thought.

It would eliminate May 30, Memorial Day, which now has nation-wide recognition as a day for reverent remembrance, depriving it of much of its significance.

ALL ANNIVERSARIES JUMBLED

The birthday anniversary of at least 10,328,060 American citizens would be entirely lost. This figure is derived by assuming the population of the United States to be 130,000,000, of which number approximately 356,140 have their birthday anniversaries on each day of the calendar year. To lop off 29 of these calendar days—that is, the 29th to the 31st of every month—would deprive more than 10,000,000 Americans of their birthday anniversaries.

A corresponding number of our citizens would lose other treasured days, such as wedding anniversaries and the anniversaries of the death of loved ones.

Every other important date, including all our holidays, would be rendered inaccurate, because, for example, June 28 on the new calendar is not an anniversary of June 28 on the old calendar, but the anniversary of a date some 10 or 11 days earlier.

The above reasons, which may be generally classed as sentimental, are, nevertheless, of tremendous importance when it is remembered how powerful an influence sentiment is in the lives of our people. To tear away from these millions the influence which they have cherished and observed through many generations would be a highly dangerous test of the strength of our social fabric.

The matter which I am placing before you has had a very interesting history. The question of calendar reform has come up dozens of times in different ages and lands, but what we are most concerned with is the most recent manifestation of interest in changing the form of our calendar.

COTSWORTH FATHER OF PLAN

I refer to the consideration of this problem by the League of Nations' committee for communications and transit since 1922. The attention of the league was called to this ever-present problem through the original efforts of Mr. Moses B. Cotsworth, who may be called the modern father of calendar reform. He is the outstanding man in our times to specialize in this subject and came to be interested in it through his connection with a large British railway company where he had as one of his tasks the explaining of the "increases and the decreases and the net earnings of the company each month." Mr. Cotsworth claims he found great difficulty in making adjustments for the irregular number of days in the month and pointed out that the variation and the number of week days in the month had a particular ill effect on the railway business, because of the light freight traffic handled over week-ends. Thus Cotsworth was led to study the whole question of calendars. He gradually received recognition by various scientific bodies. In 1909 he formally set forth, in a paper read before the Royal Society of Canada, his specific proposal for calendar reform. It is his proposal that we have been discussing, although it has more recently been commonly known as the Eastman plan, because of the interest which Mr. George Eastman, of Rochester, has taken in the 13-month calendar.

Mr. Cotsworth's plan obtained increasing support until the World War forced an indefinite postponement of the whole question. Independent of Mr. Cotsworth, other men and organizations were working on the question. In 1922 the Chamber of Commerce of the United States and the American section of the International Chamber of Commerce gave formal consideration to the question of calendar simplification. The result of this action was that the League of Nations was asked to take up the matter. The League of Nations, in 1922, appointed a committee of inquiry composed of representatives appointed by the great Roman Catholic, Eastern Orthodox, and Protestant religious authorities, astronomers, and the International Chamber of Commerce, representing business organizations of the world.

ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-FIVE CALENDAR PLANS RECEIVED

A large number of schemes were received for reforming the calendar, totaling approximately 185, which came from 33 different nations. After obtaining opinions from various governments and organizations, the committee concluded that one of its duties was to eliminate all schemes which were impracticable, judged by their possible acceptance by the public. After this elimination there remained just two groups of reform which were to be brought to the attention of the public. How interesting is the fact that when the committee sent thousands of inquiries to persons and organizations throughout the world, the replies showed that although there was some interest in the calendar reform, nevertheless, public opinion was not prepared for a serious change. In fact, many letters were received which displayed little knowledge of the different changes proposed or of universal application. It has been noticed that up to now most of the propaganda has been by organizations interested in a particular scheme to the exclusion of all others. Just as the Eastman organization is backing the 13-month plan of 28 days each, so another powerful group is backing the 12-month plan of alternating 30 and 31 day months. I call your attention to the fact that both of these leading plans for calendar reform include provision for a blank day.

Mr. Speaker, I do not care to burden you with many elements of the report of the League of Nations, but I certainly feel it is my duty to call your particular attention to a number of replies from important governments.

GERMANY SEES NO BENEFIT

For instance, Germany replied to the League of Nations' committee as follows:

The German Government can not agree that the general public would experience any essential benefits if the dates fell on the same day of the week every year. The strict correspondence of the days of the week with the dates of the month would involve disadvantages from the legal and economic points of view and also for history, since it would make it impossible to deduce the unknown year of an event from the date of the month and day of the week in which it was known to have occurred.

It is a comparatively simple matter to make the calendar quarters as far as possible equal. All that is required is to dock off a day from August and tack it on to February.

Another interesting reply came from India:

The Government of India will have to consider each of these proposed changes so far as it would affect India. The Christians are a very small minority—2,000,000 out of 340,000,000. * * * It is in the last degree improbable that the communities in India will ever adopt such drastic changes, involving the giving up of a luna-solar calendar based on the ancient systems of astronomy and indissolubly tied up with the Hindu religion. * * *

The fixation of week days and yearly blank days will equally fail. The Indian week day is the only division of time common to the Indian and European modes of reckoning; and as the Indian calendar can not change its week days unless it suffers total annihilation, there will be hopeless confusion if the day called "Sunday" in English continues to be called, as now, Monday in the Indian languages. * * *

The chief value of the week day is chronological—i. e., it enables us to verify a date. If we know that an event happened on Sunday, January 1, in one of the years 1913 or 1923, we know ipso facto (or by almanac tables) that the year was 1922. "To verify a date" means to show that all its elements—week day, month, and month day—are true in one particular year out of several years. We can ordinarily verify a day by distinguishing one year from six others in its neighborhood with the help of the week day; whereas in the Indian calendar the week day may enable the chronologist to pick 1 year out of 400. Even the moderate amount of verification possible at present in the European calendar with the help of the week day will cease if January 1 is always Sunday.

LATVIA'S VIEWPOINT

A reply from the Latvian Government contained these paragraphs:

As to the religious authorities, the Protestant Church objects to the introduction of blank days on the ground that the break in the sequence of the weeks would shift the position of Sunday. They will, however, accept the point of view which the Protestant ecclesiastical authorities of other countries may adopt.

The Netherlands reply includes this one short statement on the religious aspect:

The arguments put forward against this suggestion [of a blank day] are mainly of a religious character. Certain Calvinist communities and the Israelites consider that this reform would run counter to the religious commandment in respect of the weekly day of rest.

RUMANIA'S OBJECTION

The Rumanian Government in its reply inclosed the opinion of the chief metropolitan of the Rumanian Orthodox Church, who declared regarding the blank day:

As regards the additional days outside the 52 weeks a break in the continuity of the cycle of weeks would be regarded as inadmissible by the Rumanian Orthodox Church. It considers that the extra days should form an additional week which should be added to the year at the proper intervals.

Mr. Speaker, I now come to one of the most interesting and vital bits of testimony which can be adduced to show how significant and weighty the whole question is. I will call your attention to the comment of astronomers from various important capitals of the world.

When the League of Nations committee on calendar simplification sent the letter of inquiry to the member nations asking for comments and suggestions it was quite natural for some of the governments to refer this letter to their astronomers. These scientists were, of course, aware of the blank-day feature that would be considered by the league's committee and how this blank day would inevitably affect the cycle of the week. In addition, therefore, to commenting on the general features of the proposed change, certain of the astronomers discussed specifically the question of breaking the weekly cycle.

HALLOWED BY LONG USE

I hope you will bear with me as I quote from their remarks on this point, for I know you will find them very significant. They are incorporated in the official Government replies to the league committee inquiries which were published on August 12, 1926, in an official League of Nations document entitled "Report on the Reform of the Calendar, Submitted to the Advisory and Technical Committee for Communications and Transit of the League of Nations by the Special Committee of Inquiry into the Reform of the Calendar."

The reply from the Government of Finland incorporated the following observation by one of its astronomers:

The reform would break the division of the week which has been followed for thousands of years, and therefore has been hallowed by immemorial use. (M. Anders Donner, formerly professor of astronomy at the University of Helsingfors, p. 51.)

FRENCH STRESS CONTINUITY OF WEEK

The Government of France included the following statements by two of its astronomers:

One essential point is the continuity of the week. The majority of the members of the Office of Longitude considered that the reform of the calendar should not be based on the breaking of this continuity. They considered that it would be highly undesirable to interrupt a continuity which has existed for so many centuries. (M. Emile Picard, permanent secretary of the Academy of Science (France), president of the Office of Longitude, p. 51.)

I have always hesitated to suggest breaking the continuity of the week, which is without a doubt the most ancient scientific institution bequeathed to us by antiquity. (M. Edouard Baillaud, director of the Paris Observatory, p. 52.)

THE PORTUGESE REPLY

The Government of Portugal included in its reply to the league this observation by its chief astronomer:

It is very inadvisable to interrupt by means of blank days the absolute continuity of the weeks—the only guaranty in the past, present, and future of an efficient control of chronological facts. (Frederico Oom, director of the Astronomical Observatory of Lisbon, p. 74.)

In the same category with these is the statement of Prof. D. Eginitis, director of the Observatory of Athens, who was a member of the League of Nations calendar committee, as appointee of the ecumenical patriarch of Constantinople. This quotation is found in an extended article by Professor Eginitis, which was introduced by Dr. C. F. Marvin into the record at the hearings of our House Committee on Foreign Affairs:

The breaking of the continuity of the week, which has crossed the centuries, and all known calendars, still intact, and the universal use of this unit in the measurement of time, are the reasons that oppose this change of the calendar.

OPPOSED ON SCIENTIFIC GROUNDS

Mr. Speaker, these utterances have peculiar weight, not only because they come from astronomers but because they are made by these men in connection with a plan for breaking the weekly cycle. These scientists are offering their criticism not on religious but on scientific grounds, and their objection to breaking the weekly cycle takes on added force when it is known that virtually all of these men are really desirous of calendar revision, so desirous, indeed, that some of them are willing to surrender the confessedly great advantages of a fixed weekly cycle in exchange for certain advantages which they believe would accrue from calendar revision. In other words, their desire for calendar reform and the personal willingness of many of them to surrender the week in favor of general reform, does not in any way cause them to minimize the importance of the perpetuity of the weekly cycle from time immemorial.

Now, Mr. Speaker, may I draw your notice to the fact that the Foreign Affairs Committee of this House also heard a number of witnesses of that type and may I tell you something about their testimony?

SCIENTISTS DO NOT ALWAYS AGREE

Of the scientific men who spoke in behalf of the resolution, there were such men as Dr. George K. Burgess, Director of the Federal Bureau of Standards; Dr. W. S. Eichelberger, of the Naval Observatory, who is Director of the Nautical Almanac; and Dr. C. F. Marvin, Chief of the United States Weather Bureau. These men made their appeal on the point that the proposed change would aid greatly in the keeping of accurate comparative records.

When a member of the Academy of Sciences was on the stand Representative COOPER asked him to give a definite example of how the present calendar works a handicap on science. "You scientific men who differ anywhere from fifteen to sixty million years as to the age of some fossil bones would surely not be troubled over a little matter like calendar change, would you?" my colleague inquired. "It is not really quite that bad, is it?" the scientist laughingly replied. But the committee member was not so easily stopped. "Right out in my part of the country," he declared, "just that very thing happened when some dinosaur bones were dug up. One scientist said they were 15,000,000, and another came along and said they were 60,000,000 years old."

WEEKLY CYCLE INTACT

I asked Doctor Eichelberger whether he knew of any change in the calendar or in the reckoning of time from the days of the Egyptians down to our present age that has affected in any way the free-running week or caused a change in the days of the week. To this the learned doctor answered simply, "No." A few moments later another committee member asked almost identically the same question, for the point was obviously vital to the whole argument being set forth by the opposition. A third committee member restated the question by inquiring whether our present Sunday is the lineal descendant, in cycles of seven, from the Sunday of the Resurrection. Before the doctor had time to reply, another member said: "Would not this follow from the previous statement that there has been no time lost and that the week has not been broken?" To this the doctor answered simply, "Yes."

When Doctor Marvin was testifying he was asked whether he knew of any change in the reckoning of time and of calendars that has affected the free-running week and the order of the days as we now have them. He replied that his definite knowledge of the subject went back only as far as the early part of the fourth century, when the Roman Empire adopted the Jewish, or Christian week, as he described it, and that from that time onward he did not know of any change in calendars or in time reckoning that had affected the order of the days of the week as we now have them.

THE JEWISH CALENDAR

Well, then, Mr. Speaker, let me give you the complete story and all of the facts concerning the early Jewish calendar.

The study of the Jewish calendar is important, not only for students of history and chronology, but also for students of religion—Jewish and Christian—since the calendar in question was used in the Jewish Bible and in the time of Jesus. The New Testament states that Jesus was crucified on the eve of Passover, on a Friday, and arose on the third day, which was Sunday. We know also that in the first three centuries of the present era, the early Christians had not yet separated themselves from the Jews and still kept their festivals according to the Jewish calendar.

The calendar which was used by the early Hebrews was a lunar one. This is indicated by the word for month, which is "Jerach," and is derived from the word "Iorach," which means moon. This calendar was calculated according to the lunar system of the neighbors of the Hebrews, the Phœnicians. The moon's phases are more easily observed by primitive peoples than the positions of the stars, or the still more difficult observations of the equinoxes and solstices.

HEBREW WEEK CALLED "SHEVUA"

Seven days constituted a week and was called "Shevua." The seventh day of the week was called Sabbath and considered holy, as God had rested from the work which He had created in six days. A month consisted of 30 days and was called "Hodesh." The word "Hodesh" means new—referring to the new moon. It is worth while noting that the same inconsistency characterizes our present usage, when we say the months July and August, and so forth. The word "month" is from the root moon, but our months are not based upon the moon. A more striking parallel is to be found in the Russian calendar, a solar one, where the word for month, "mesat," is also the word for moon. The Greek usage is similar. The Jews had no specific names for the months; they called them the first, second, third, and so forth. Neither had they any names for the days of the week, but numbered them, excepting the seventh day, which was called Sabbath.

Take the word "week." This word as found in the Old Testament comes from a root meaning "seven." To reveal the close relationship between these two terms it should be explained that in ancient Hebrew only the consonants were written. The context enabled the reader to know which of the possible variant meanings should be understood in each case. Now, written in this fashion without vowels, the words translated "seven" and "week" are identical. Thus the ancient scribe had to decide by the context whether to give it one pronunciation and read it as "seven," or give it a little different pronunciation and read it as "week," for in the spoken language there was a slight difference in pronunciation.

To be more exact, when the hearer listened to the word as pronounced for "week," there was really conveyed to his mind the thought of "sevenfold" or "a combination of seven," which was the very accurate Hebrew way of describing the "week." Thus embedded in the very roots of that ancient language is found one of the strongest proofs, not only of the existence, but of the great antiquity of a time cycle of seven days.

EIGHT-DAY WEEK A CONTRADICTION

To have spoken to an ancient Hebrew of a week of eight days, for example, would have sounded in his ears like a contradiction of terms, for how could eight be "a combination of seven"? It would have been as inaccurate as for one unacquainted with the English language to speak of a fortnight of 18 days, for the very word fortnight is a contraction of "14 nights." Only by an accommodation of terms could such statements be made. By extension, the word "week" was sometimes understood to mean a combination of seven years, but the context easily revealed when this very logical extension of the term should be understood.

The Scriptures themselves speak of the week long before the giving of the law on Mount Sinai. Laban said to his son-in-law Jacob with regard to Leah, "Fulfill the week of this one." (Gen. xxix, 27.) The history of Jewish customs reveals that this phrase refers to the week of wedding festivities, which were considered a part of the ceremony and which lasted seven days. A comparison with verse 22 shows that the feast had been called, and a comparison with various other scriptures reveals the custom of holding feasts seven days. Thus does the Bible corroborate authoritative statements that the week has been known "from time immemorial."

BASIS OF SEVENTH-DAY OBSERVANCE

The hosts who gathered at Sinai were a people whose ancestor Jacob was well acquainted with the time cycle called the week, and whose very language employed a term meaning "a combination of seven" to describe that cycle. What then would be their most natural conclusion when they listened to the Sabbath commandment of a cycle of seven days—"six days shalt thou labor, but the seventh day is the Sabbath"—"in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, and rested the seventh"?

In the absence of any declaration to the contrary, would they not most obviously conclude that "the seventh day" meant the seventh day of the week, that long-established combination of seven days? To that most natural conclusion Jews everywhere through all the centuries have come.

The solar calendar, which we have discussed previously, was in existence among the Jews before the exile. During their stay in Babylon they became acquainted with another calendar system, the Chaldean, which was a lunar-solar system. In this the month was regulated according to the moon, and the year according to the sun.

JEWS FIND THEIR CALENDAR IMPERFECT

The Jews, after their return from Babylon, perceived that their own calendar was not only a complicated one, requiring the addition of a day every three months, and of 49 days at the end of every 49 years, but also an imperfect one, since the year does not have 365 days, as they first thought, but 365¼. They accordingly changed their calendar to the lunar-solar, in which the month was theoretically one of 29½ days. In practice one month had 29 days and the following 30, and so on. They also introduced names for the months, which they had learned from the Babylonians. The months were no more called by numbers, but by names, like "Nisan," "Iyar," "Sivan," and so forth. These names of the months appear only in the postexilic literature. Whenever the names of the months are given in the Books of Esther and Zachariah, the editors add respectively that this is the first month, the ninth, the twelfth, and so forth. In the same manner, as we have noticed before, when the month of "Ziv" was given in the Book of Kings, the editor adds, "that is, the second month." As "Ziv" was no more known and had to be explained, so in the postexilic period "Nisan" had not as yet come into popular usage, and the editor had to explain by number which month was meant.

INSERTED A SPECIAL MONTH

In order to adjust the lunar months to the solar year, they intercalated from time to time a special month of 30 days. This kept the festivals in the proper season of the year—Passover after the vernal equinox, and Tabernacles after the autumn equinox. Although the ancient Jews kept intact the seven days of the week as they had been in the first week of the creation, they abandoned the idea that the annual holidays should always fall on the same day of the week. They thought it more important to have the annual festivals in the proper seasons of the year. Furthermore, the festival of Shabuot (Weeks), which, according to the Bible, has no fixed date of the month, they arranged on the fiftieth day after the first day of Passover without regard to any special day of the week.

To make this calendar more systematic, they adopted from the Greek usage the 8-cycle system; that is to say, they inserted three months in the course of every eight years. In each seventh year one would have to intercalate a month, thus putting the Jews to the hard necessity of inserting a month in the sabbatical year as well as in the postsabbatical year. They therefore adopted the Greek system, adding a month in the sixth year (which is a presabbatic), in the fourth, and in the second. This is according to the testimony of Julius Africanus and agrees with what we know from the Tannaitic literature about intercalations. They also changed the new year from the spring to the fall. The reasons for this change are, first: All the nations at that time counted their years from the fall. Secondly, by changing the new year to the fall, the Jews, at that time an agricultural people, made the beginning of the sabbatical year, traditionally in the fall, coincide with the beginning of the regular year. As to the Biblical phrase that the month of the Abib—that is, the month of the spring—is the first month, the rabbis interpreted this to mean that the month of the "Abib" ("Nisan") is first in the counting of the months, but that the civil year actually begins with the fall (Tishri).

ADOPTED BY CHRISTIANS

Such was the state of the Jewish calendar during the second commonwealth up to the fourth century. This calendar is that of the New Testament. The festival of Passover which Jesus celebrated and the Pentecost for whose celebration Paul went to Jerusalem, were according to this calendar. The early Christians, in the first three centuries of the present era, kept the festivals according to the same calendar. Passover was observed after the vernal equinox on the full moon, and Pentecost, on the fiftieth day after Passover.

The early Christians, who accepted Sunday as the day of rest instead of Saturday, did not change the order of the days of the week. They merely changed the Sabbath from the seventh day to the first day of the week, or Sunday. Thus Justin Martyr: "On the first day of the week God made the world, and Jesus Christ, our Saviour, on the same day rose from the dead." In the Apostolic Age some Christians observed both the Jewish Sabbath and Sunday, but the order of the week was kept intact by the Jews as well as by the Christians from time immemorial.

I believe I have given sufficient evidence to prove that never before in calendar changes has there been any interruption in the succession of the days of the week. Perhaps I have gone into too great detail on that angle, but I am under the impression that most people are erroneously informed in this regard.

ADVOCATES ANNOYED BY OPPOSITION

At the hearings of the Committee on Foreign Affairs the gentlemen who advocated the adoption of the new calendar were very much annoyed by our opposition and claimed that they could not understand our attitude on the question of a blank day. They seemed to feel that there was nothing unusual about skipping days and they assumed an attitude that we were narrow in our views when we opposed the zero day. There were two arguments in particular which they stressed in trying to tear down our defense of the uninterrupted succession of seven days of the week:

1. The Sabbath can not be kept and has never been kept at the proper time because we live on a round world.

2. Why should you oppose the institution of a blank day when that is just what Moses did in order to adjust the calendar of his time?

Mr. Speaker, it was unusual to hear learned scientists speaking before the committee of losing or gaining a day in travel around the world. They set forth the contention in varied form, and at some length, that the Sabbath commandment can not really be kept under the present calendar, if a person crosses the date line.

THE MINISTERS' DILEMMA

One savant portrayed the situation that would confront two ministers who might journey in opposite directions around the world to attend a church conference at Manila. He pictured the dilemma that he believed would confront them in adjusting their reckoning of days. Another read a long paper entitled "The Wandering Sabbath," in which he brought out the argument that the Sabbath could not be kept at the same identical moment of time in different parts of the world, and therefore why insist so rigorously on maintaining its identity?

A third scientist summed up the case in a nutshell when he declared: "I would like to throw out this thought with regard to the blank day. Why not leave it a blank day and forget it? Everybody that crosses the international date line either adds or loses a day."

Because this "round-world" argument was employed by the calendar proponents at the hearings and because this argument, if allowed to remain unanswered, apparently nullifies the whole protest over the seventh day, we believe it should be examined in some detail.

WHICH SEVENTH DAY IS SABBATH?

Mr. Speaker, we may fittingly introduce our examination of the question with an inquiry as to what the commandment says is the day of the Sabbath. We read that "the seventh day is the Sabbath." The "seventh day" of what? Of the year? Of the month? No; the seventh day of the week. This point is as obvious as when the Sunday observer says, "I keep the first day," meaning the first day of the week. Of course, we are aware that some may possibly quibble over this understanding of the commandment. But the Biblical and historical value of the phrases "first day" and "seventh day," as signifying the first and seventh days of the week, is so overwhelming that we may properly ignore any captious objections. In other words, the man who wishes to obey most literally the Sabbath injunction needs only to make certain which is the seventh day of the week.

With this basic proposition in mind, let us consider now the admissions of the scientists themselves. They testified that they had no knowledge of any changes in calendars throughout the centuries that had in any way affected the reckoning of the days of the week. From this we conclude that right here in Washington, D. C., we can know with confidence the order of the days. In other words, we can know when the seventh day of the week arrives.

EXPLAINING THE CONTRADICTION

But is this true only of Washington? No. Have they kept the true cycle of the weeks out in San Francisco? Most certainly. And if we should travel far across the Pacific and over the Trans-Siberian Railway into Europe, would we find the people there keeping the true cycle of the week unbroken through the centuries? Most assuredly. In short, no matter where we might go, we would find that the people know the weekly cycle, and therefore know when the seventh day of the week comes.

We can travel to any continent, without knowledge of astronomy or meridians and when we reach our destination, we simply inquire of the inhabitants of that place, and they can tell us what day of the week it is.

The fact therefore is clearly established, that the order of the days of the week is known in different parts of the world, and that therefore the seventh day can be known and kept on every part of the globe. The apparent contradiction between this proven fact and the phenomenon of losing or gaining a day in travel, grows out of a double definition of words. Obviously, the difficulty in this particular case revolves around the word "day." We agree with the definition of the scientists that a day is the period of time that elapses during one revolution of the earth upon its axis. The Bible writers describe the day as the period from evening to evening, that is, from sunset to sunset. And what causes the sun to rise and set? The rotation of the earth. There is complete agreement in definition of terms. In fact, the day is one of the most rigidly fixed units of time.

MATTER OF DEFINITION OF WORD

When we speak of losing or gaining a day in travel, we are really giving a new definition of the word. We are defining days, not in terms of the journey of the earth on its axis, but rather in terms of the journey of human beings around the earth, which is quite a different thing. The trouble, of course, grows out of the fact that the traveler moves from the given point at which he began to measure the day. If days be defined in terms of man's journey around the earth, without making allowance for his changing point of measurement, then the most unbelievable possibilities arise.

Let us imagine an airplane capable of traveling a thousand miles an hour. A man starts westward in such a plane at noon Sunday. The sun is always overhead, because he travels westward at the same rate as the sun. Twenty-four hours later—that is, on Monday noon—he reaches again the spot whence he started, and still the sun shines overhead. When he alights from his machine, would he be correct in declaring that it was still Sunday noon?

DAYS CHANGE IN TRAVELING

When a person travels, his days are of abnormal length. If he travels in the same direction as the sun, he can not but lengthen his day, because he keeps the sun in view for a longer period than if he should stay in one spot. And when he had accumulated a number of such abnormally long days, must he not finally drop out and thus apparently lose a day in order to keep his reckoning in harmony with the true order of the days as measured by the rotations of the earth?

For example, the New Yorker who travels westward across the United States finds it necessary to set his watch back one hour on three different occasions in order that the time by his watch shall correspond with the true course of the day. Otherwise his watch will register 3 p. m. when the California sun is only at high noon.

Mr. Speaker, for all practical purposes the sun is quite a rigid and inflexible timepiece, and so is a watch. A watch that registers noon in New York will register noon again 24 hours later, even though in the meantime it may have been transported to Chicago in the traveler's vest pocket. But the sun which found itself over New York at noon on one day is destined to be in that position 24 hours later. The tourist who has reached Chicago must content himself to greet the sun one hour later—on regular schedule.

HIS DAY 25 HOURS LONG

Hence this traveler's day, from noon to the next noon, is 25 hours long. If he immediately whisks himself and his watch another thousand miles westward, he will again find that his timepiece registers noon when the sun is still one hour from noon. Thus his second day's journey is 25 hours long. Pursuing such a course westward at a thousand miles a day will bring the traveler back to his starting place in 24 days—estimating the world's circumference at exactly 24,000 miles, for the sake of the illustration.

But each of his 24 days has been 25 hours long. Therefore in his trip around the world he had accumulated a total of 24 extra hours. If he has not already dropped them an hour at a time, he must finally drop the whole 24 at once, if he wishes to keep his reckoning correct. Now 24 hours equals one day. Therefore he drops a day. But is a moment really stricken from his life on that account?

SCIENTISTS' CONTENTION RIDDLED

Mr. Speaker, when Doctor Marvin contends that the Sabbath can not be kept on a round world because 24 hours must be dropped in circling it westward—or added in encompassing it eastward—he must, if consistent, contend that the Sabbath can not be kept except in one-time belt. And that is exactly what one scientist declared before our committee. He maintained that the ancient Jews, who lived in one-time belt—Palestine—could keep the Sabbath, but that any one living to the east or to west of this one-time belt would not really be keeping the Sabbath, because he would not be observing it at the same identical moment of time.

But narrow though Palestine is, it has some width from east to west. Therefore the Jews on the eastern border must have begun their day before those living on the western shore. Only a few minutes earlier, it is true; but if a few minutes' difference does not interfere with Sabbath observance, why should a few more minutes, or perhaps an hour or two, or more, affect it?

ANCIENT JEWS' TIMEPIECE THE SUN

Furthermore, to speak of the Palestine Jews as dwelling in one-time belt is to transport back to those ancient days a unit of time adjustment that is both arbitrary and modern. Their only timepiece was the sun, and, therefore, only those Jews who lived directly in one line north and south were in the same time belt. To move one step to the east or the west of that given line—but no such line was "given"—would necessitate beginning the day either earlier or later.

Doctor Marvin has invented a difficulty that does not exist. He maintains that the Sabbath can not be kept at the same identical moment of time in different time belts. But neither the Sabbath command, nor the Bible anywhere, speaks of time belts, or of keeping the Sabbath at the same identical moment of time. The Good Book tells us that we should keep the seventh day, and that we should keep it "from evening to evening." Could a man dwelling, for example, in the next time belt west of Palestine, tell when the sun went down on Friday evening?

Mr. Speaker, God does not ask man to base his obedience upon what other men in other parts of the world may be doing.

CAN BE OBSERVED EVERYWHERE

I believe I have answered the question which Doctor Marvin and his associates put before me at the meetings of the Foreign Affairs Committee—"Can the Sabbath be kept at the proper time on this round world?" I am convinced that it can and I feel that it has been properly observed and I do not propose to do anything which will interfere with the proper observance of either the seventh day Sabbath or the Lord's Day Sabbath, according to the wishes of the individual.

I come now to the second of the very significant questions which Doctor Marvin asked of me, when he tried to break down our case in defense of the preservation of the seven-day week, as we have it now. Doctor Marvin asked: "Why should you oppose the institution of a blank day when that is just what Moses did in order to adjust the calendar in his own time?"

Mr. Speaker, this question, too, would have seemed to me amazing and unusual, coming from a man of science, but I was familiar with the idea which he expressed because I had already studied that angle in my investigation of the whole calendar problem. When I heard these scientists speak of "Moses and his extra Sabbath" I knew that they referred to what was rather fully explained in complete pamphlet entitled, "Moses, the Greatest of Calendar Reformers," written by my questioner and critic in conjunction with Moses B. Cotsworth, of whom I spoke before. This booklet was published by the International Fixed Calendar League, which states its object in these words:

ALL OBSERVE SAME DAY IS PLAN

It is the purpose of this pamphlet, first, to show how easily and completely the perpetual Mosaic calendar of the exodus can be reconstructed; and second, to show how very small and unimportant are the differences between it and the proposed 13-month calendar. * * *

As soon as these great truths of modern research become known and understood, conscientious believers in Moses and the Scriptures need not oppose on any grounds, religious or otherwise, the suggested reform of the present unscientific, inconvenient, and unscriptural modern calendars. Rather should the restoration of what is best in the fundamental Scriptural calendar declared through Moses, be welcomed by all (p. 5).

Had that Mosaic calendar been retained, all generations of Jews, Christians, and Mohammedans could have perpetually observed in unity all the commands of Jehovah, in complete yearly rounds of exact anniversary commemorations for all the great religious events, during their ancient united and later separate histories. * * *

Therefore all nations of the world are to be invited by international conference to join in universal observance of the same six days of work, and especially of the same seventh day of rest on fixed yearly dates, as Moses prescribed (pp. 2, 3).

BECOMING TRADITIONALISTS

It is very kind, indeed, of these gentlemen to describe Moses as "the greatest of calendar reformers." All sincere followers of any of our modern religions are happy that they are willing to eulogize him as the author of a calendar which was "nearly perfect." It is interesting to see these men of science go to such ancient sources for strengthening their own cause. They are suddenly becoming traditionalists, as we are, and I must rejoice on that account.

But, Mr. Speaker, I can not allow the printed challenge of Doctor Marvin to go unanswered, any more than I could permit his earlier question to go without a reply. The questions are fundamental to the case, and I must bring to your attention what I believe is the actual explanation of the Mosaic calendar.

I shall not contest the explanation in this pamphlet concerning the fact that Moses, at the time of the exodus, established a solar calendar of 365 days. While this question is debatable, the results are not vital to the defense of my side. Neither shall I delay my argument by replying to the statement that "the Sabbath was not the seventh day of the week as we understand it to-day, but simply the seventh day after six days of labor," because the pamphlet brings no proof to bear on this point and it is simply a shot in the air.

CLAIM MOSES ORIGINATED BLANK DAY IDEA

The claim put forth in the pamphlet of Marvin and Cotsworth is that the fifth day of the third Hebrew month, Sivan, while reckoned as a day of the month, was not counted as a day of the week. This was the day of Pentecost. It was an "extra Sabbath," similar to the "blank day" of the present proposed calendar, according to their theory. In other words, although the 4th of Sivan was Sabbath, the 5th was not "Sunday," but simply a continuation of the Sabbath of the 4th—a blank day as far as the reckoning of the days of the week is concerned. Now 365 days equal 52 weeks plus 1 day. But this extra day being eliminated from the count of the weeks, made the year really consist of an exact number of weeks. This caused the next year always to begin on the same day of the week as the year before. And, as a result the days of the week always bore the same relationship to the days of the month. Marvin and Cotsworth insist that Moses originated this blank-day principle, and they are simply striving to restore it by proposing that the last Saturday in December be followed by a blank day.

The first point that the authors attempted to make is that the Mosaic calendar was solar, which proves nothing at all.

They claim it proves that it possesses perpetual qualities on that account, but we can point to our present calendar, which is also solar, and show the opposite. However, through the wording of the pamphlet, the reader is led to believe that since the Mosaic calendar was really solar he must be ready to accept everything else stated in the pamphlet! Not only are the arguments of the authors misleading, but even the evidence of outside witnesses is presented to give the impression that they are supporting all the arguments of the pamphlet, whereas some of the authorities quoted back only certain elements.

QUOTES HEBREW SCHOLARS

For instance, Dr. Julian Morgenstern, president of Hebrew Union College, and Prof. W. L. Heidel, famous Semitic scholar, are quoted in support of the solar nature of the ancient Jewish calendar, but they are mentioned together with other writers who support the "blank-day principle instituted by Moses" theory. I am very happy to bring to your notice some correspondence of my friend Mr. F. D. Nichol, of Takoma Park, D. C., with these authorites on the Hebrew calendar. Mr. Nichol wrote in inquiry:

The writers of this pamphlet quote you as one of the authorities in support of the major premise of their thesis, because of your contribution on the calendar of ancient Israel. Your name and the quotations from your work, placed as they are in this pamphlet under the general head, "Some Authorities We Quote," lead the general reader to the impression that your researches warrant the ultimate conclusions to which the writers of the pamphlet come. I wish to inquire whether I would be correct in obtaining this impression. In other words, have your researches led you to believe, as do the writers of this pamphlet, that Moses devised a perpetual calendar that placed the Sabbath in a fixed relationship to the month, necessitating the existence each year of an extra Sabbath.

The reply of Doctor Heidel contained one sentence which you will agree summarizes his whole attitude:

Messrs. Marvin and Cotsworth have quite absolutely misrepresented my views.

DOCTOR MORGENSTERN'S REPLY

Doctor Morgenstern's reply goes into the whole question quite thoroughly and I therefore bring it to your attention in toto:

THE HEBREW UNION COLLEGE,
OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
Cincinnati, Ohio, January 30, 1929.

MY DEAR MR. NICHOL: Replying to yours of the 24th instant, I am very happy to be able to assure you that Messrs. Marvin and Cotsworth have used my name in their propaganda for the new calendar entirely without my authorization and knowledge, and that the quotations from my article on The Three Calendars of Ancient Israel apparently altogether misrepresent the facts with regard to the history of the calendar of ancient Israel which I have been able to establish. * * *

Certainly I did not advance the thesis "that the ancient Jews lived under a fixed or perpetual calendar devised by Moses," which caused the Sabbath always to recur on the same days of the month each year, instead of being an institution related only to the week, as we have it! On the contrary I showed in this article that, at various times in the history of ancient Israel, different calendar systems were employed, that up to approximately 621 B. C. the old Canaanitish calendar, a purely solar calendar, taking cognizance of the days of the solar equinoxes, was employed in ancient Israel. Then from about 621 to a time somewhat later than 400 B. C. another calendar, apparently a lunisolar calendar, was employed, based apparently largely upon some Babylonian model. It apparently took no cognizance whatever of the Sabbath, which continued a weekly institution, falling upon any date in the month, regardless of any considerations other than the Sabbath came every seventh day. At some time after 400 B. C. the calendar at present employed by the Jewish Church, also based upon Babylonian antecedents, was instituted. This also makes no effort to coordinate the Sabbath with any particular days or dates in the month.

HIS ARTICLE MISUNDERSTOOD

I showed likewise that at some time, probably in the third century B. C., an attempt was made to introduce into ancient Israel a calendar similar to that which Mr. Cotsworth is championing, with the year divided into 13 months of 28 days, and with particular attention given to the coincidence of the Sabbath with a particular date in each month, probably the seventh, fourteenth, twenty-first, and twenty-eighth days. This calendar is employed as the basis of reckoning in the books of Jubilees and Enoch, two, pseudepigraphical writings which were never regarded as authoritative. This calendar, however, was never recognized as official by Judaism and never came into actual use. Furthermore, Moses himself had no connection whatsoever with any of these calendars. It is clear therefore, that the above-named gentlemen have either not troubled to read my article carefully, or, if they did, have not understood it or have not wanted to understand it. Certainly, the facts which they state and the conclusions which they drew from them are altogether unwarranted by my article.

I trust that this gives you the information which you desire.

Very sincerely yours,

JULIAN MORGENSTERN, President.

NO BASIS FOR THEORY

Need I say more, Mr. Speaker, about the authorities upon which Marvin and Cotsworth rested their case? It seems to me that we have here sufficient evidence to convince anyone that there is absolutely no basis to the theory propounded. I can say to you most emphatically that whatever adjustments, changes, and variations have occurred in the Jewish calendar from the earliest period down, the one central feature always was to maintain the week of seven days without any interruption whatsoever. Moses was not the author of the blank-day principle, and, much as I believe that Moses was a great prophet and a wise man, I am not convinced that he could foresee what some scientific authorities of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries might invent, namely, a "zero day"!

The strongest link in their attempt at proving that Moses skipped a day in order to make the Pentecost come on the Sabbath Day is a text which they quote from our Bible, Leviticus xxiii: 15, 16, 21:

Ye shall count unto you from the morrow after the [Passover] Sabbath [the fifteenth of the first month, Abib], from the day that ye brought the sheaf of the wave offering; seven Sabbaths shall there be complete; even unto the morrow after the seventh Sabbath shall ye number fifty days.

Ye shall make proclamation on the selfsame day [that is, on the fiftieth day, Pentecost]; there shall be a holy convocation unto you; ye shall do no servile work.

THE JEWISH INTERPRETATION

The calendar authors understand the term "Sabbath" in this passage to refer always to Sabbath days. Thus they claim that they are placing two Sabbath days together, because "the morrow after the Sabbath" was to be a Sabbath also—Pentecost—an entirely impossible theory.

If you desire to see the Jewish normal interpretation of these verses based on the authorities in past ages and our own time, I refer you to the translation of the Bible issued by the Jewish Publication Society of America:

And ye shall count unto you from the morrow after the day of rest [Sabbath, in Hebrew] from the day that you brought the sheaf of the waving seven weeks shall there be complete; even unto the morrow after the seventh week shall ye number fifty days; and ye shall present a new meal of offering unto the Lord.

This represents a very old controversy. According to the Jewish tradition, the Biblical commandment to offer the omer (measure of barley) "on the morrow after the Sabbath" was interpreted by the rabbis to refer to Passover, so that it meant that the seven weeks should begin to be counted from the first day after the beginning of Passover. There was an early interpretation that it should begin on the first day after the first Sabbath during the Passover, which would make Pentecost always fall on Sunday. This sectarian view has completely disappeared.

BACKED BY BIBLE SCHOLARS

But what I would point out to you is that even this sectarian view in no way favors the idea of a wandering Sabbath. It rather emphasizes the word "Sabbath" so that it could not be used even for another holiday.

Every scholar of the Bible that I know of has corroborated this statement and I feel certain that it destroys entirely the false claim that Moses skipped a day and changed the regular succession of seven days of the week.

One bit of evidence on this double-Sabbath argument remains to be answered. After declaring that in ancient times the Jews kept such a double Sabbath, the authors add this persuasive claim:

The significant fact remains, that through traditional usage the Jews generally continue to observe two consecutive days at the feast of Pentecost.

In reply we inquire: If at the present time a devout Jew can observe two days at Pentecost without breaking the cycle of the week, why could he not have done so in ancient days?

TWO DAYS OBSERVED BY JEWS; WHY?

The facts are that when the Jews were dispersed from Palestine, they began the custom of keeping two days in connection with each annual Sabbath (festival), excepting Atonement Day, for fear that in their reckoning of time they might have made an error of a day in determining the beginning of a month. (The explanation for the failure to observe the two days in connection with Atonement Day is that it would have necessitated 48 hours of complete fast.) By the time a calendar had been agreed upon by the "Dispersed Jews" throughout the world, during the fourth century A. D.—the custom of celebrating two days for each feast had become so firmly established that it was retained by most Jews. This second day that is kept in connection with each of the annual feasts is described in Hebrew by a phrase which, translated literally, means: "The second day of the holiday observed in lands of exile." The custom has never been followed by the Jews in Palestine, for the simple reason that they had no cause to be uncertain over the reckoning—they were not in exile.

ALL ARGUMENTS ANSWERED

Therefore, for the purposes the authors intended, "the significant fact" of the double Sabbaths now kept by Jews in various lands, has no significance. Instead it has a significance on our side of the argument. The very fact that the reckoning of months presented such difficulties when the Jews moved from Palestine, reveals that absolute confusion into which the Sabbath institution would have been thrown, if it had been related to the months, as this unwarranted theory contends. Only by being wholly free of any calendar could the Sabbath be kept in various lands.

We discover, therefore, from an examination of Jewish history and from a study of the different senses in which the word "Sabbath" may properly be understood, that the arguments built upon Leviticus xxiii, 15, 16, have no foundation.

Mr. Speaker, I believe I have disposed of every possible argument which our opponents brought up before the hearings of the Foreign Affairs Committee of Congress. I have even taken up matters which the proponents of the 13-month plan have written about in material not submitted to our committee. My case is complete and I find that there are just a few loose threads that I need gather together to have placed the whole proposition before you from a historic, scientific, and economic viewpoint, not to mention the all-important religious sentiment involved.

THE QUESTION OF THE FIXATION OF EASTER

First of all I do not want to be misunderstood as being in opposition to any calendar change which involves only the fixation of Easter. This is a problem in itself upon which I have nothing to suggest. I take it to be a strictly religious question to be delegated to ecclesiastical authorities of each religion. If these authorities feel that there are numerous disadvantages resulting from a civil or religious point of view in the nonfixity of Easter, it is within their power and right to adjust it in any way that they deem advisable. The claim has been made that because the date of Easter varies at present between March 22 and April 25, over a period of 35 days it brings about complications and displacement of other movable festivals. The fixation of Easter will have no effect at all upon the 7-day week and need introduce no blank day. Therefore, I can not utter a word of objection to such an effort on the part of religious authorities. Likewise, the matter of Easter will not involve any legal, economic, or religious difficulties and can meet with no objection if the leaders of all denominations can agree upon such a change. Please understand that my opposition to calendar change does not include any change which involves only Easter.

OFFER SUBSTITUTE PLAN

In the second place I would like to call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that we opponents of the 13-month calendar have offered some compromise suggestions for the reformers. It is possible, we claim, to establish a 13-month-28-day calendar without the zero-day principle.

The substitute proposal is to institute the new plan and, when the 364 days have been finished, and start a new year on the next day, calling it January 1. This will prevent any interference with the correct observance of the sixth-day Sabbath by Mohammedans, seventh-day Sabbath by Jews, and Sabbatarians, or first-day Sabbath by observers of Sunday. Of course, we realize that the year will have lacked one day because the correct solar year has 365 days plus. To overcome this lost day the substitute proposal suggests that we wait until seven such days have been accumulated (in six years or five years) and then add a solid week to the calendar of that year.

In other words, this scheme would provide for five years in succession consisting of 13 months with 28 days in each month, and the sixth year to be made a leap year by the addition of the 7 lost days, or a whole week. This plan would have the advantage of the Eastman calendar without its disadvantage of a blank day. The only interruption to the regular sequence of 28-day months would be once in five or six years.

WHY NOT SAVE UP 28 DAYS

To my mind an even better proposal is the plan whereby these blank days are accumulated until there are a whole month of them. Twenty-eight days would accumulate in 23 years. This means that there would be no interruption in the regularity of the 28-day month calendar, except once in 23 years.

If the proponents of the calendar reform are really in earnest about the advantage that would accrue to the world, they would undertake to have such a calendar put into effect. They would, of course, have to convince the general public of the need for calendar reform and would have to clearly prove the advantages of a 13-month calendar, but at least they would be assured of no opposition from any religious denomination—Protestants, Catholic, Orthodox, Sabbatarian, or Jew. Mr. Speaker, is this not a fair proposal that I am making to the gentlemen who are advocating the need of a change in our calendar?

ITS USE IN BUSINESS NOW

There was one interesting point brought out at our hearings before the Foreign Affairs Committee which I do not believe has been properly emphasized. We heard many representatives of leading business firms in the country expounding the advantages of the 13-month plan. They spoke from experience, for some of them had been using this scheme for 10, 15, or 20 years. We were given to understand that business efficiency was increased tremendously and that for their particular concern the adoption of the 13-month plan meant a great step forward. In almost every case I questioned the witnesses about the practicability of this 13-month plan in conjunction with the present calendar, and I was pleased to learn that after a short period of adjustment all employees were able to conduct their affairs efficiently, although they had a different calendar for the management of the business.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, I learned—and I believe that my colleagues in the committee were also convinced—that it is entirely possible to reap the advantages of this 13-month calendar without upsetting the whole world. My claim therefore is that those firms which see real benefits in the adoption of this scheme should do so. No one will interfere with them.

Mr. Speaker, I sincerely believe that every business man can utilize the 13-month plan without making it necessary to have Congress or State legislatures or the League of Nations foist this new scheme on an unwilling and unprepared world.

"DUTY" TO INDORSE IT

Then again, Mr. Speaker, I must explain my stand in this matter because the claim was repeatedly made at the hearings of our Foreign Affairs Committee that it is the duty of Congress to adopt the resolution I am discussing. It was even suggested that it may be mandatory upon us to do so because, at the Pan American Conference in Habana February 18, 1928, the following resolution was unanimously adopted by the delegates of the 21 nations of that conference: That it be recommended to the countries, members of the Pan American Union, that they each appoint a national committee with a view to studying the proposal relative to the simplification of the calendar, and that they make the necessary preparation in order to participate in an international conference which is the best method of reform.

At the opening hearing of the Foreign Affairs Committee held on Thursday, December 20, 1928, we were reminded that this Pan American conference was duly authorized by a resolution of Congress; that the conference was regarded as one of great importance. The impressive list of American delegates was called to our attention: Hon. Charles Evans Hughes, chairman; Hon. Dwight W. Morrow, ambassador to Mexico; Hon. Henry D. Fletcher, ambassador to Italy; Hon. N. B. Judah, ambassador to Cuba; James Brown Scott; Hon. Oscar W. Underwood; Hon. Morgan J. O'Brien; Ray Wilbur; Dr. Leo S. Rowe.

The members of the Foreign Affairs Committee were told that these delegates of the United States were unanimously in favor of the resolution and that the resolution before our committee was introduced to ratify the action of our delegates at the Habana conference.

NEWS TO MR. HUGHES

Touching on this point, Mr. Speaker, may I quote one of the ranking members of our committee in a statement he made to our committee on Friday, December 21, 1928. I quote my colleague, HAMILTON FISH, of New York, verbatim:

> I have heard it stated here both by the introducer and by Mr. Eastman, that one of the main bases of this resolution was the fact that it had been endorsed by the Pan American Conference. I had the pleasure last night to dine at the same time with Mr. Hughes and had the opportunity to talk with him after dinner. Mr. Hughes told me that Mr. Eastman's representatives came to him at the Pan American Conference and wanted him to introduce this resolution. Mr. Hughes told me that he told them that he had other troubles and other matters to discuss and he did not even know that the Pan American Conference had passed this resolution.

I mention this because of the claim by some advocates of the plan that it is the duty of Congress to ratify the action of the Pan American Conference. There is no such "duty" for us. We are free to consider this on its merits.

"PIGS IS PIGS" AUTHOR HAS HIS SAY

My task is done, Mr. Speaker. However, after this long, exhaustive, and serious study of the whole question, I can not resist the temptation of adding just a bit of spice. You might even call it levity, but you will have to admit that it is clever and humorous. You are all familiar with the name of Ellis Parker Butler. He has probably made you laugh in moments when you were seeking amusement and perhaps he has brought home to you a truth or two which was more evident because of his jesting attitude. A few days ago one of his widely syndicated articles appeared under the title of "The Reformed Calendar" and, since this is the subject which we have been discussing, I take the liberty of quoting a few paragraphs from his column:

> The most important event in world history since Congress voted to prohibit skating on the Panama Canal is this proposal to reform the calendar. It seems that the calendar has been behaving in a drunk and disorderly manner, sometimes coming home at the end of the month with 31 days and at other times bringing home only 28 days and refusing to say what it did with the other 3—although I certainly have my suspicions!—and it is time something was done about it.
> All this irregular behavior was especially annoying to bankers and business men. Many a time I have had men come into my bank and borrow $8,000,000 and say, "I will pay you this on the 31st of November," and when November came around, I would discover there was no 31st, and there would be $8,000,000 simply thrown away, and I would have to pay it out of my salary.

FINALLY CALL NEW MONTH "FIDO"

> In order to have every week begin with the same day—Sunday—we had to divide the year into 13 months of 28 days each, and this meant putting a new month into the calendar. To do this we put the calendar on the table, cut it in two with a hatchet and sewed the new month in between June and July.
>
> Personally, I was opposed to this. It meant that a busy man—and who is not?—would have to remember the names of 13 months instead of 12 (1 doz.), and I favored a year of 365 months of 1 day each, numbered from 1 to 365, or a year of 1 month with the whole 365 days in it.
> It then became necessary to select a name for the new month, and for several years now the "best minds" (quotation) of the committee have been working on this problem. As the new month is to be sandwiched in between June and July it was first proposed to call it "Ham," but as Henry L. Parsons does not like ham sandwiches, we were inclined to call it "Cheese" in deference to him. James C. Coffin objected.

"I insist on 'Ham,'" he said. "If we call the new month 'Ham' we can call the surplus day at the end of the year 'Eggs,' because it is, so to speak, an eggstra day, and both will be easy to remember. That is, if they'd let us live to call it."

We finally decided to call the new month "Fido."

The only other change in month names was the one we made in the case of June. Since abbreviating June as Ju and July as Ju leads to confusion, we have changed "June" to "Jane." We have, however, made some of the months change places. January and February are always cold and unpleasant and July and August are always too hot, so we have put July and August in place of January and February. This ought to average things up and make all these months pleasanter, and it will please a lot of people to have January 1 come in July as they will be away on their vacations when the bills come in, and July 4 is much better in January then where it was. Darkness comes much sooner in January and we can have the fireworks earlier in the evening.

ANUARY, BEBRUARY, CARCH

It seems that it is a great strain on busy minds to have to remember whether July comes before August or after September, and to make this easier Henry L. Parsons proposed at our last meeting to "alphabetize" the names of the months so that anyone who knows his A-B-Cs will know just where the months come in the calendar. Thus January will hereafter be called Anuary, February will be called Bebruary, March will be Carch, and April will be Dapril, and so on.

The holidays gave us a lot of trouble. Our plan was to have all holidays fall on Monday, but this made Fourth of July fall on either the 2d, 9th, 16th, or 23d, which would make two Fourths of July in one month. This we will correct by having the United States declare its independence again, on the 2d of July, prior to which it is only necessary for Great Britain to reannex the United States. This will, of course, necessitate another War of Independence, but that would be a pretty good thing because the old one is no longer up to date, not having any poison gas, tanks, or submarines in it. It is going to be a little more difficult to get Columbus to discover America again to agree with the new calendar. The last time we were in communication with him, through Madame Borotti, the medium, he said, "No, ma'am! Ex-cuse me! If I had known what it was going to be like, I would not have discovered it in the first place." We will probably have to have America rediscovered by some needy English novelist.

Mr. Speaker, laughter is common to all of us and laughter can make us brothers. I trust that my colleagues who have heretofore favored the newly proposed calendar see clearly through their laughter as well as their serious consideration that their efforts in behalf of the new project will not tend to make the world feel more brotherly. It will add unnecessary confusion, bring about religious persecution, create economic difficulties, and altogether contribute not at all to the Brotherhood of man through the Fatherhood of God. I trust that you will not pass this resolution.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. SELVIG, by unanimous consent (at the request of Mr. ANDRESEN), was granted leave of absence, on account of illness in his family, to-day.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—CENSUS AND REAPPORTIONMENT

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, the Constitution of the United States, so far as it relates to census and reapportionment, is as follows:

Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. * * *

The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of 10 years, in such manner as they shall by law direct. The number of Representatives shall not exceed 1 for every 30,000, but each State shall have at least one Representative. * * *

The authority for apportioning Representatives rests on the language of the first paragraph above quoted, now section 2 of the fourteenth amendment. The census enumeration is the basis of the apportionment, as set forth in the second paragraph and is a part of section 2 of Article I of the Constitution.

It is argued that the language in the first paragraph constitutes a mandate for a new apportionment every 10 years. The provision as to the census is mandatory, but the language used as to apportionment can not be so construed. Much propaganda has been spread over the pages of the newspapers and thoughtlessly echoed here to the effect that Congress violated the Constitution by failing to pass a reapportionment law after the census of 1920. It is now generally conceded Congress was within its constitutional rights in refusing to take action.

The census of 1920 was taken at a time when conditions were unsettled after a great war; when a general shift of population was in progress; when people were away from their usual places of abode, making a correct enumeration for the allocation of Representatives very difficult. A great injustice would have resulted to many States if representation had been fixed under that census.

A MATHEMATICAL PROBLEM

The apportionment of Representatives presents a mathematical problem. Applying the method used in 1910, the number of Representatives is first fixed, then the population per Representative is found by dividing the total number of people in the country, excluding Indians not taxed, by the number of Representatives, which has been 435 since the apportionment under the 1910 census. This division gave 211,887 persons for each Representative. The same method would have given 242,415 persons per Representative under the 1920 census. Under the 1910 census Vermont was given two Members. With a population of 352,428 the State had 211,877 for the one Representative and 140,551 left over. This number left over was more than one-half of the number 211,887, and was, therefore, a major fraction, giving the State the additional Representative.

TWO SOLUTIONS

Two solutions of the problem have been proposed, that of major fractions used after the 1910 census, and that of equal proportions. It appears that the method of major fractions has been used but twice in the history of reapportionment. The method is admittedly unsound, is not approved by mathematical societies of note, and by a comparatively few well-known mathematicians. Its principal advocate made this explanation of it in the hearings.

I will answer briefly. The method of major fractions rests on the finding of a ratio in the first place; you find a ratio which will divide the population of each State to give a certain whole number and a certain fraction in each quotient. The method of major fractions rests on the theory that a Representative should go to each State for each unit of the quotient, and also for each fraction above 0.50 in the remainder. That was the method that was followed in the last apportionment, that of 1910.

This statement by the author troubles the lay mind, to say the least. The method did not work out well in 1910, since Ohio had a major fraction and did not get the extra Representative because there were not enough Representatives to give one for each major fraction.

The method of equal proportions became available in 1921 through the efforts of Prof. Edward V. Huntington, of Harvard University. He describes this method in the following words:

The method is based on a simple and direct comparison between every State and every other State. If the population of a congressional district in one State is, say, 10 per cent larger than the population of a congressional district in another State, then there is said to be a disparity of 10 per cent between the two districts. Equal proportions guarantees that the unavoidable disparities remaining between two States can not be further reduced by any shifts in the assignments to those two States.

This is a simple explanation of a common-sense plan and carries out exactly the scheme of representation contemplated by the framers of the Constitution.

The method of equal proportions is the only method which will make both the ratio of population to representation and the ratio of representation to population as nearly the same as possible in all the States. I am not unmindful of the fact that the bill as amended in the Senate provides for the certification of the number of Members to which each State will be entitled under each method, but preference is given to the now obsolete major-fractions method.

OTHER OBJECTIONS

The measure before us provides for taking the decennial enumeration and for the reapportionment of Representatives.

I am opposed to the census portion as it was originally written because it provided for the actual enumeration at a period of the year when many of our people will be away from this usual places of abode, and when it is becoming difficult to get about our nothern country. Then, it is provided for an enumeration during 1929. We have had one enumeration since 1920. Here it is proposed to have another within the "subsequent term of 10 years." Will it be contended that this complies with the provision of the Constitution?

The people of my district are opposed to the bill so far as it relates to reapportionment because, in effect, it directs the President to designate the number of Representatives for each State. The language used is a direct delegation to the executive department of authority to do something that should be done only by the legislative department. Little by little we are centralizing authority in the executive departments and divesting the legislative. We are following a dangerous course and one which will cause trouble in the future. We are fast getting away from the ideals of the founders of the Government and going back along the long road that led to this Government of the people, for the people, and by the people.

We are opposed to it because its application will favor States with the great centers of population over those made up of rural communities. The provisions of the bill strike a blow at rural New England. I do not know what other members of that delegation may do in respect to its passage, but I shall vote to protect the interests of the people of my section of the country and have no explaining to do and no apologies to make to my constituents.

The people I have the honor to represent are opposed to the measure because it, in effect, gives representation to citizens of foreign countries to the exclusion of representation to American citizens, native born and naturalized. Why should citizens of Poland, Russia, Italy, Spain, Mexico, and other countries be entitled to be directly represented in this legislative body of the people of the United States? Why give these people a voice in shaping of our laws and deny it to the people of my State, who, with their forbears, have stood for the protection of the Nation in every crisis of her existence?

We have in our total population more than 5,000,000 persons who owe allegiance to other flags than ours who will be represented in party conventions and in the Electoral College and who, though not citizens of this country and without sufficient interest in our institutions to even apply for naturalization, will be counted to add to the number of electoral votes of the States in which they reside.

We have in this country more than 2,000,000 persons who are here without right and in defiance of law, and yet it is proposed to count them, together with the orientals who are expressly denied citizenship, to increase the representation of certain States and to give to those States a greater influence in framing the laws of the Nation than is given to the native-born and the naturalized citizens of my State.

The only excuse for this proposed action is that to refuse to count aliens would be in violation of the Constitution. Those who urge that reason should study the splendid argument to the contrary by that great authority on the Constitution, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER].

When the word "persons" was used in the Constitution did it mean American persons or persons owing allegiance to other countries? For whom did we ordain and establish our Constitution? Was it for citizens of the then new Nation or for citizens of other nations? The answer is right before us in the preamble in the words "for ourselves and our posterity."

I am not opposed to reapportionment at the proper time. When the census enumeration is completed there should be a new allocation of Members. But this Congress should not put itself in a position of saying to a future Congress, "If you do not pass a proper law you must take what we give you." We are trying to do the work that should be done by another Congress.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Speaker, Detroiters can well rejoice over the great constitutional victory they won to-day in the House. The fact that the reapportionment bill had tough sledding over a very rocky road and was threatened time and again with disaster, makes victory all the more sweet.

Detroit will gain three or four new Congressmen when this bill goes into effect. As I was a member of the Census Committee which shaped the bill practically as it is, after many bitter and fierce quarrels in committee and on the floors of the House and Senate, I take a deep personal satisfaction in to-day's results. We are just closing one of the greatest constitutional struggles in the history of the country since the constitutional contest over slavery which ended only on the battle fields of the Civil War.

DETROIT FACES STRUGGLE

I predict that Detroit will face within a year or two the fiercest constitutional struggle in the State legislature that Michigan has ever seen. It will be the same battle that has been fought in the House—the rural versus the city forces. I have not the slightest doubt but that serious efforts will be put forth in the Michigan Legislature to gerrymander and shoestring congressional districts, so that Detroit's representation in Congress is cut down as much as possible. The same battle will be fought undoubtedly between the country and the city forces in the States of New York, Illinois, Missouri, California, and in other States where the issue has been drawn between the city and country for many years. It seems fair to presume that the disposition of the governors in Michigan and these other States will be one of the deciding factors as to whether the big cities get justice or not.

It behooves Detroit to prepare for this struggle by seeing that all eligible aliens become citizens as rapidly as possible, as the census will be taken within a year and the more aliens it shows in Detroit the more powerful weapons are placed in the hands of the State legislature to deprive Detroit of Congressmen to which it is justly entitled.

FEWER ALIENS IN DETROIT

The foes of reapportionment have tried to make aliens in the big cities their scapegoats. Several times in this debate these foes have charged that there are upward of 300,000 aliens in Detroit. On June 3, at the beginning of this debate, I discussed quite fully the probable number of aliens in Detroit, and quoted a telegram from O. T. Moore, the United States naturalization district director at Detroit, giving it as his opinion that instead of upward of 300,000 aliens residing in Detroit he estimated the number at considerably below 100,000. This number is being cut down monthly through efforts of public-spirited men in Detroit, who are urging and compelling aliens to become citizens and through the natural desire of the aliens themselves to become citizens.

I hope to see the efforts to cut down the number of aliens in Detroit through citizenship intensified within the next few months. Enemies of Detroit in the State legislature will probably abuse the presence of aliens in Detroit to cut down the number of Congressmen who are allotted to Detroit and Wayne County in the next redistricting by the legislature.

As a matter of fact, the real animosity of the foes of reapportionment toward Detroit arises not from the number of aliens so much as the number of college graduates in Detroit.

Most newspapers are owned by college men and most newspaper reporters and editors who unceasingly criticize bigotry and fanaticism are college graduates. Having gone through four years of college they are less provincial and prone to petty and religious hatred than others who have not enjoyed the privilege of coming into contact with the sportsmanship or higher education of the college.

MORE COLLEGE GRADUATES

The charges against Detroit with regard to aliens did not take into consideration the fact that there are undoubtedly more college graduates per capita in Detroit than in the congressional districts of Detroit's critics. The University of Michigan Club of Detroit is the largest body of college alumni in the world.

One of the professors of the University of Michigan has recently published statistics showing that the cities are sending more boys to college per capita now than the rural districts are. These figures overthrow the common belief to the contrary. It is also true that more college men settle down in cities like Detroit than upon the farms or in small towns. The reason is that they have a better opportunity to practice their profession and make more money. They also appreciate more the greater conveniences of life and the greater opportunities for a better existence than in the rural sections of the country.

Detroit hardly needs a defense from me against the unjust attacks made upon it in the House during these debates on reapportionment. Detroit is probably the richest city in the world per capita, and an individual has greater opportunity there than in any other city in the world to gain the good things of life.

DETROIT GREAT TRADE CITY

Detroit is the most distinctive trade city in the world to-day. It leads the world in many lines of manufacture, and its products are a godsend to all the peoples of the earth. It is the home of the greatest captain of industry the world has ever known—Henry Ford—and it is the home also of probably more well-known captains of industry than any other city in the world. As one travels in the United States or in other parts of the world he will find more inquiries and more curiosity about the greatness of Detroit and its celebrated men than any other city on this planet.

Detroit has suffered these recent attacks because it has taken the lead in Congress in the battle for reapportionment which spells a new era in progress and enlightenment for this country. For at least eight years Detroit has been cheated out of the additional three or four Congressmen to which it is entitled under the Constitution of the United States. It has protested vigorously against this injustice and has helped to stir up sentiment in all the big cities and in the press of the country against this outrage.

Los Angeles will probably get as many additional Congressmen under the reapportionment as Detroit, but Los Angeles has not been criticized in Congress.

Texas, North Carolina, and Florida will gain additional Congressmen, and I predict that Texas will show a surprising increase in population and may get as many additional Congressmen as Michigan, but one has never heard any comments or criticism of Texas that has been recently heaped upon Michigan.

TWO DETROITERS ON COMMITTEE

Detroit and Michigan have fought the battles of the growing cities and States of this country, and with the blame and criticism should go the praise, the honor, and the glory.

It was eminently fitting and proper that the House Republican organization should place upon the Census Committee two Congressmen from Detroit, thus breaking all precedents in committee organization. This act has stirred the rage of foes of reapportionment in the House and Senate, but it is a tribute to the wisdom and fairness of Speaker NICHOLAS LONGWORTH, Leader TILSON, and the Republican committee on committees.

In this connection I wish to express my own gratitude and that of the six or seven hundred thousand Detroiters whom I represent, to Speaker LONGWORTH and Leader TILSON particularly. Reapportionment would have failed within the last few days except for their heroic efforts and brilliant leadership. I know my city and State is grateful to Messrs. LONGWORTH and TILSON.

I wish also to express my gratitude and that of my people to Congressman CARL CHINDBLOM, who was one of the most powerful floor leaders in the battle for reapportionment, and also to my colleagues from Michigan, Congressmen CLARENCE J. MCLEOD, CARL MAPES, and EARL MICHENER, who labored so valiantly in stirring up sentiment throughout the country for reapportionment and in organizing the House for victory.

HOUSE WILL BE LEGAL

These men will help to lift from the House the odium of hypocrisy which was continually being charged against it by the press of the country in the matter of reapportionment. We have also made it probable that in 1932 the House will be for the first time in a number of years legally constituted and organized under the Constitution by one stroke. We will have switched the House membership from a dishonorable to an honorable body. We have fully earned this praise and distinction.

A CORRECTION THAT DID NOT CORRECT

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to Members of the House to extend their remarks on reapportionment, I make this brief statement.

On February 7, 1929, I addressed the House on the reapportionment bill, which had passed the House a few weeks before and which was then pending in the Senate. The closing paragraph was as follows:

> In conclusion I call the proponents of this bill back to a defense of the Constitution. I ask you to join us in the great work in which we are now engaged. I beseech you not to enact a law that will blush for shame every time it meets the Constitution face to face. There is still time to return. An old familiar quotation, with a slight modification to make it accurate and truthful, fits this situation, and with that quotation I close:
>
> While yet the light holds out to burn
> The brightest sinner may return.

This paragraph was printed correctly in the daily RECORD and in the biweekly RECORD, and I had no reason to believe it would be printed otherwise in the bound volumes of the permanent RECORD. Yesterday, however, my attention was called to the fact that some unknown genius in the Government Printing Office had changed the word "brightest" to "vilest" and that the last line in the permanent RECORD (page 3035 in part 3 of volume 70) read thus:

> The vilest sinner may return.

Just why this unknown genius took the liberty to substitute "vilest" for "brightest" I do not know. Perhaps he thought I needed help to bring my remarks to a proper conclusion. Certainly, I would not criticize that viewpoint. He may have thought that my theology was not sufficiently orthodox. It may have occurred to him that to speak of "the brightest sinner" was rather modernistic and that "the vilest sinner" was more in harmony with fundamentalism. It may be that his purpose was to inspire mankind, like the youth who passed through the Alpine village crying out "Excelsior." Possibly he thought that "the brightest sinner" was an inaccurate expression. The paragraph in question self-evidently referred to Members of Congress and he may have felt that it was incorrect to allude to a Member of Congress as "the brightest sinner." He apparently concluded that "the vilest sinner" would be more truthful and appropriate.

Whatever the high purpose of this unknown genius, I want to thank him for his profound interest in my remarks; but the fact remains that he made me say the very thing I did not wish to say and which I refused to say. I deeply appreciate his generous interference and the remarkable ability he demonstrated in wrecking a whole line by the change of a single word, but I can not concede that it was excessive praise to refer to a Member of Congress as "the brightest sinner."

I must insist that the closing lines remain as they were written and as they were printed in the daily and biweekly RECORD before this unknown genius played the part of the genial and well-known character in the china shop. Notwithstanding the efforts of this unknown genius and notwithstanding my deep veneration for him, I must insist that my remarks closed with these words:

> While yet the light holds out to burn
> The brightest sinner may return.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, June 12, 1929, at 12 o'clock noon.

THOMAS W. CUNNINGHAM—RECUSANT WITNESS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEASE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I can not ask the Senator to do that, because I want to submit a few remarks, three or four moments in length, as introductory to a resolution which I wish to offer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield for that purpose?

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I promised to yield to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] at his request. I have no objection to doing so. Before doing so, however, I desire to state that I withdraw my objection to the resolution of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. However, I want to go on record as being absolutely opposed to what is going to happen; but, at the same time, after the Senator's explanation I have no desire to keep a man in jail, because I do not think the Senate has any right to put him there.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution submitted yesterday just before the recess by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 89) was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

ORDER FOR RECESS

Mr. BROOKHART obtained the floor.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield to me to submit a unanimous-consent request?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield for that purpose?

Mr. BROOKHART. I do.

Mr. WATSON. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it recess until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

RECEIVERSHIP OF CHICAGO RAILWAY CO.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire to submit a Senate resolution, but before introducing it I wish to say that on the 15th day of December, 1926, the Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Co. applied before the United States district judge in the city of Chicago for the appointment of a receiver for the Chicago Railway Co. At the time the application for receivership was made it was consented to by the railway company. At that time, under their own allegations, there was only due from the Chicago Railway Co. to the Westinghouse Electric Co. the sum of $67,075 for materials purchased. This indebtedness had not even been put into judgment.

The district court, upon the consent of the parties appearing in open court, appointed receivers upon this claim which, as I said, was not even in judgment. The court appointed three receivers—John J. Mitchell, Frederick Rawson, and Henry A. Blair. Mr. Blair, one of the receivers, was at that time president of the defendant railway company. The judge fixed the salaries of the receivers at $60,000 each. Mr. Blair was also drawing at that time $60,000 salary from the defendant railway company. Blair and Mitchell, two of the receivers, were directors of the Commonwealth Edison Co., an Insull company.

Then the judge, in addition to the $60,000 salary for each of the three receivers to collect this debt of a little more than $60,000, appointed an attorney for the receivers and fixed his salary at $25,000 a year, and another attorney whose salary he fixed at $24,000 a year, and then appointed a secretary for the company at $6,000 a year, all for the purpose of collecting $67,075 that was not yet in judgment.

It is claimed by a great many of the most respectable people and business men in the city of Chicago that this was a coercive proposition between the officials of the railway company which went into the hands of receivers and the Insull interests, and was done for the purpose of giving the court jurisdiction in a later case. The plaintiff in the receivership case, being a nonresident corporation, was entitled to commence action in the United States district court, but there was a corporation known as the Harris Trust Co., which held first-mortgage bonds against the railway company amounting to $158,000,000 not yet due. The Harris Trust Co. was an Illinois corporation. If it had commenced foreclosure proceedings it would have been compelled to start them in the State courts of Illinois. It is alleged that this was a ruse in order to permit the larger corporation to get into the United States court.

Incidentally an investigation will show, so it is claimed by very good authority, that the whole thing was an attempt on the part of the Insull company to get possession of the public-utilities companies of various kinds in the city of Chicago.

Incidentally the Senate will remember that not long ago it was disclosed before the Federal Trade Commission that two Chicago papers were at least in part purchased by the International Power & Paper Co., a part of the Power Trust. It will appear that these two papers, in a long contest which has been going on for years in Chicago between two sets of people, one wanting to have municipal ownership of public utilities and the Insull interests which are opposed to it, had always fought the Insull interests heretofore, but that after this transaction, which came out before the Federal Trade Commission, both papers changed front and are on the other side of the question. That, I think, is a proper item for investigation by the Federal Trade Commission in its investigation which it is now making, and I sincerely trust it will go to the bottom of it.

The resolution which I present provides for an investigation by the Judiciary Committee of the question as to whether or not this procedure took place and whether it is one of the means of getting, by such subterfuges, out of the jurisdiction of the State court into the jurisdiction of the United States courts.

The resolution will have to be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but permit me to inquire whether it should go there first or to the Judiciary Committee for a recommendation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Either course would be proper, the Chair thinks.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the custom is to refer such resolutions first to the standing committee having jurisdiction of the subject matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the practice.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask that the resolution be referred to the Judiciary Committee.

The resolution (S. Res. 90) was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Whereas in a certain suit in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, eastern division, to wit, No. 6839, it has been charged that the court assumed jurisdiction as a result of collusion between the attorneys or officers of the Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Pennsylvania, and the attorneys or officers of the Chicago Railways Co.; that the basis for said alleged collusive receivership was the application of said Westinghouse Co. in suit No. 6686 for the appointment of receivers of the properties of the Chicago Railways Co. on the allegation that there was due and unpaid a bill of $67,075 for materials theretofore furnished; that said Chicago Railways Co. immediately appeared in said suit No. 6686, and admitted said indebtedness and consented to the appointment of receivers when it had many times that amount on deposit in banks with which it might have paid said bill; that three receivers, viz, Henry A. Blair, president of said railways company; John J. Mitchell and Frederick H. Rawson, presidents of banks of Chicago, were appointed; that Messrs. Blair and Mitchell were then directors of the Commonwealth-Edison Co.; that said Blair and Samuel Insull, of said Commonwealth-Edison Co., "wrongfully formed the purpose, and entered upon a plan to deprive the holders of the participation certificates of said railways company of their said equity in said properties of said railways company"; * * * "that to that end also said Blair—being in full control of said Chicago Railways Co.—caused a collusive judgment to be entered in the United States district court"; that this was an inaccurate statement, as said receivers were appointed on a claim not even reduced to judgment; that during the first year of said collusive receivership several times the amount of said claim was paid out by said receivers in salaries and fees; that the purpose of said collusive receivership was apparently to deprive the State courts of jurisdiction in the foreclosure of trust deeds securing payment of approximately $100,000,000 of bonds of said Chicago Railways Co. in default since February 1, 1927, and to control or largely influence the reorganization of traction interests in Chicago and State legislation affecting such reorganization and refinancing:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to institute an investigation to determine whether by means of said collusive proceedings the said United States district court was induced to assume jurisdiction which properly belonged to the State courts of Illinois.

Said committee or any subcommittee thereof is hereby authorized to sit during the sessions of the Senate or during any recess, at such times and places as may be necessary; to require the attendance of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents; to employ counsel and other assistants; and to employ stenographers at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per 100 words. The chairman of the committee or of any subcommittee may administer oaths to witnesses and sign subpœnas. Every person duly summoned before said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, who refuses or fails to obey the process of said committee, or who appears and refuses to answer questions pertinent to said investigation, shall be punished as provided by law. The expenses of said investigation shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate on vouchers of the committee or subcommittee, in an amount not exceeding $10,000.

REORGANIZATION OF FEDERAL BUREAUS FOR PROHIBITION ENFORCEMENT

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, while I have the floor I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on the Judiciary, with amendments, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 53) to create a joint congressional committee relating to the reorganization and concentration of the agencies connected with prohibition enforcement, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 30) thereon.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the joint resolution, I think, should be passed to-day so that it will go to the House before they take a recess. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] a day or two ago stated that he would like to speak on the resolution. I have not been able to get in touch with him this morning, but presume he will be here within a few moments. Therefore I ask that the report be received and the resolution go to the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be placed on the calendar.

FARM RELIEF—THE DEBENTURE PLAN

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Washington Post of this morning, in an article in reference to the vote on the debenture yesterday, among other things had this to say:

> Subsequently the House leaders, together with the Senate leaders, went to the White House for a conference with the President, after which it was announced a vote would be permitted in the House to-morrow.

I desire to congratulate the House upon having received this generous permission on the part of the President to let it exercise its constitutional right to pass on legislation. I was a Member of the House for several years. I want to congratulate the House on getting this opportunity to express itself upon the farm relief bill and at the same time I want to congratulate the President on his kindness and consideration and on this generous exercise of clemency on his part toward the House in graciously permitting the House, after all this time, to vote upon the farm relief bill.

REPORT FOR THE EXECUTIVE CALENDAR

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, from the Committee on Foreign Relations I desire to submit a report for the Executive Calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be received and placed on the Executive Calendar.

MILK RIVER IRRIGATION PROJECT, MONTANA

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 3317) to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes," which I understand is on the Vice President's desk, may be taken up for immediate consideration and passed. I do not think there will be any debate upon it. It provides for an appropriation of $17,000 for the Milk River project in Montana, which was apparently overlooked in one of the appropriation bills.

I have a telegram from the secretary of the irrigation district, in which he says:

> The House has just passed a bill introduced by LEAVITT (H. R. 3317) making appropriations for Milk River irrigation project for fiscal years starting July 1 apply to Glasgow division. It is highly important that this bill pass the Senate, if possible, immediately. The Glasgow irrigation district and the farmers in the district are vitally interested. If not passed, their water will be shut off this year. Will appreciate it if bill is pressed in Senate as fast as possible.
> S. L. RUGG,
> Secretary Glasgow Irrigation District.

Unless the bill shall be passed apparently it means that the water will be shut off and the crops destroyed. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, what is the request? I could not hear what the Senator from Montana stated.

Mr. WHEELER. The request is that a bill proposing an appropriation for the Milk River irrigation project, involving the expenditure of $17,000, be considered and passed. The bill has passed the House of Representatives and has come to the Senate. It is absolutely essential for the great majority of the farmers living on the project that the bill be passed immediately; otherwise the water will be shut off.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I can not distinctly hear what the Senator from Montana is saying. I understand, however, that the measure for which he desires consideration is a bill making an appropriation?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order, so that Senators may hear what is going on. Will the Senator from Montana please again state his request?

Mr. WHEELER. I will do so. The request is for the immediate consideration of House bill 3317, which passed the House of Representatives on yesterday. It provides for an appropriation of $17,000 for the Milk River irrigation project, in Montana, and I am informed that unless it be passed immediately the water will be shut off on that project, which will result in the ruin of the crops of the farmers upon the project.

Mr. WARREN. I inquire if the bill has been received from the other House and is it now upon the table of the Vice President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is on the table and has been laid before the Senate for action without reference to a committee.

Mr. WARREN. The bill should be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, so that it may come before the Senate in the regular way. The committee will consider it promptly.

Mr. WHEELER. The only reason for asking immediate consideration of the bill is the necessity of having it passed at once, so that the essential steps may be taken under it.

Mr. WARREN. I do not think it is a good plan to pass bills in this way, without reference to the proper committee.

Mr. WHEELER. I appreciate that it may not be the best plan. The appropriation, however, is only for $17,000. The bill has passed the other House, and I understand has the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. WARREN. I understand that there is some question about the amount of expenditure which will be involved by the measure, but if the Senator will let the bill go to the Committee on Appropriations I will see that it is considered very promptly.

Mr. WHEELER. Very well.

The bill (H. R. 3317) to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes," was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] is entitled to the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BROOKHART. Certainly.

Mr. McNARY. I simply wish to inquire if the appropriation proposed is to be taken from the reclamation fund?

Mr. WHEELER. That is my understanding. This is a bill (H. R. 3317) to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The appropriation comes from the general reclamation fund, but it was inadvertently omitted from the general bill.

Mr. McNARY. Very well.

MUNICIPAL CENTER IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, three days ago House Joint Resolution 97, relative to the establishment of a municipal center in the District of Columbia, was before the Senate, but the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEASE] asked that it go over until he might examine it. He has since examined the measure and does not now object to its consideration and passage. It proposes an appropriation of $3,000,000 out of the funds of the District of Columbia which are now in the Treasury, to be devoted to this purpose. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I could not hear the request of the Senator from Wyoming. I should like to have the title of the measure stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 97) making appropriations toward carrying out the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the establishment of a municipal center in the District of Columbia," approved February 28, 1929.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. KING. Is this the joint resolution which calls for the expenditure of $3,000,000 for the purchase of land in the District of Columbia?

Mr. WARREN. It is; but the appropriation is to be made entirely from funds of the District, and is to be expended for the establishment of a municipal center in the District of Columbia.

Mr. KING. I shall not object, but I think we are acting rather precipitately in the matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Wyoming has stated that the appropriation is to be made entirely out of funds of the District of Columbia?

Mr. WARREN. It is.

Mr. McKELLAR. Under what system of computation is that conclusion reached? I understand the money is to be appropriated by Congress.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, Congress, of course, appropriates the money for the District of Columbia; but in this case the appropriation comes entirely from the surplus money which has accumulated in the Treasury to the credit of the District, and which had been reserved by the District. The District now desires to devote this fund to the purpose of establishing a municipal center here.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am not going to object to the consideration of the joint resolution, but I think we ought to have the matter carefully examined.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,000,000, to be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and the Treasury of the United States in the manner prescribed for defraying the expenses of the District of Columbia by the District of Columbia appropriation acts for the fiscal years during which payments hereunder may be made, toward the acquisition of squares Nos. 490, 491, and 533, and reservation 10, in the District of Columbia, including buildings and other structures thereon as a site for a municipal center, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the establishment of a municipal center in the District of Columbia," approved February 28, 1929, to be available until expended. Of such amount not to exceed $10,000 shall be available for the employment by contract or otherwise for architectural and other professional services as shall be approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and without reference to the classification act of 1923, as amended.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield for that purpose?

Mr. BROOKHART. I do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. HEFLIN. I desire to announce that my colleague the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] is necessarily detained from the Senate by illness.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. BLAINE]. I request that this announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Iowa is entitled to the floor.

NATIONAL-ORIGINS CLAUSE OF IMMIGRATION ACT

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. NYE. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business on this calendar day it shall recess until the hour of 12 o'clock on Thursday, June 13, at which time the unfinished business shall be laid before the Senate; that starting at 1 o'clock on that day debate upon Senate Resolution 37 shall be limited to 10 minutes on the part of each Senator; that at the hour of 3 o'clock, without further debate, the Senate shall proceed to vote on the unfinished business; and, further, that following the vote on Senate Resolution 37, the conference report on Senate bill 312 shall be laid before the Senate and that a vote thereon shall be taken not later than 5 o'clock on the same calendar day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the first part of the proposed agreement has already been entered into, the Senate having agreed that when it concludes its business to-day it shall take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection to the request for unanimous consent of the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I believe that this question can be debated to a conclusion to-morrow and that a vote can be taken on that day; but the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], who is not here to-day, and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] have both notified me that they expect to speak at length upon the question before a vote shall be taken. Both of them, I believe, are opposed to the position which I have taken on the question, but I want to play fair with them, and I do not believe that there would be an opportunity for such debate as they desire under the proposed agreement. Therefore I am constrained to object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

ELIGIBILITY OF ANDREW W. MELLON, SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BROOKHART. I yield.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, at the time the Judiciary Committee submitted its report to the Senate pursuant to Senate Resolution No. 2 the majority of the committee did not incorporate within the report any of the information or data upon which the report was based. Certain of the minority reports were supported by considerable data. Those of us who concurred in the majority report feel that in order that the report may be complete there ought to be added the information, or some of the information at least, upon which the report was predicated. I have prepared certain tabulated information which has been considered by the committee, and now ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD and as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to, part 7 of Report No. 7, is as follows:

[S. Rept. No. 7, pt. 7, 71st Cong., 1st sess.]

ELIGIBILITY OF ANDREW W. MELLON AS SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

Mr. STEIWER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following supplemental report pursuant to Senate Resolution 2:

The report of the Committee on the Judiciary heretofore made pursuant to Senate Resolution 2, on the eligibility of Andrew W. Mellon to serve as Secretary of the Treasury did not include any data or information upon which it was based. In view of the fact that certain of the minority reports were supported by considerable data, the majority of the committee deem it desirable to present, as supporting their views, the following tabulated information:

During my incumbency of the office of Secretary of the Treasury I held dividend-paying stocks in corporations, but of course had no connection directly or indirectly with national banks or with any concerns doing business with Treasury Department. Such stock ownership was not regarded as in the slightest degree a disqualification. Legal advise upon this point was definite and to my mind conclusive.

I note that one question raised before your committee is whether one may be Secretary of the Treasury who owns stock in domestic corporations. I have been asked if while I was Secretary of the Treasury I was the owner of any such stocks. I was. I did own a number of stocks of small aggregate value; I regret to say very much too small. Every good citizen should try to save and invest in good securities, including stocks of his Nation's industries. I imagine it would be very difficult to secure a competent person for Secretary of the Treasury who is not the owner of stocks.

Senator FREDERICK STEIWER,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR STEIWER: Your letter of April 30 asking, as a member of the Judiciary Committee, whether, while serving as Secretary of the Treasury, I was a stockholder in any company engaged either directly or indirectly in trade or commerce, is before me.

While Secretary of the Treasury I remained the senior member of my law firm and an active producer of farm products of many kinds, which made me interested in trade and commerce, and during the five years of my incumbency, I acquired a half interest in a copartnership, and became the largest stockholder in a corporation, both producers, and therefore both interested in State and interstate commerce, but I was careful not to violate the time-honored statute which prohibits the Secretary of the Treasury from being "directly or indirectly interested in the business of trade or commerce."

The fact that we had to sell what we produced did not change the nature of our business from that of producer to that of trade or commerce. Trade and commerce, with us, and with me, was an incident to the business of production.

I was familiar with the statute, the manifest purpose of which I approve, and if I had become directly or indirectly interested in the "business of trade or commerce"—again to quote the exact language of the statute—I should have expected the House to have impeached me, and the Senators of that period, without having first disqualified themselves as impartial triers of the issue, undoubtedly would have convicted me.

The statute needs no elucidation from me, and yet I suggest that the Members of the First Congress evidently thought it would be unwise, perhaps imprudent, to have a tradesman Secretary of the Treasury. Hence the statute, and hence the admirable wording thereof. It is careful not to prohibit producers, either farmers or manufacturers, though both are necessarily interested in trade. The inhibition is made to apply only to those interested in "business of trade or commerce."

Yours with great respect,

LESLIE M. SHAW.

STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA,

County of Allegheny, ss:

I, Arthur V. Davis, being first duly sworn according to law, do depose and say that I am chairman of the board of directors of the Aluminum Co. of America, and reside at Pittsburgh, County of Allegheny, State of Pennsylvania.

That I am thoroughly acquainted with all transactions that took place between representatives of the Aluminum Co. of America and the Quebec Development Co. and/or Canadian Manufacturing & Development Co., and in connection with which Mr. Andrew W. Mellon testified before Rowland W. Philips, commissioner, in New York on July 2, 1928, on account of a private suit brought by George D. Haskell against the Duke estate and the Aluminum Co. of America; and, further, that I was president of the Aluminum Co. of America at the time these transactions took place.

That Mr. Andrew W. Mellon has not been a director of the Aluminum Co. of America at any time while holding the office of the Secretary of the Treasury; and I, as chairman of the board of directors of the Aluminum Co. of America, and the other directors of the corporation, handled all of the negotiations and consummated all agreements for and in behalf of the Aluminum Co. of America.

That I have examined the merger agreement referred to in said testimony and find that Mr. Andrew W. Mellon did not sign the same, and that not only did he not sign the said agreement but I know of my own knowledge, as well as from the records of the corporation, that he did not execute any other agreement or memorandum in connection with the said transactions.

During all the time that Mr. Mellon has been Secretary of the Treasury I have been intimately acquainted with all of the affairs of the Aluminum Co. of America, and I further depose and say that since March 4, 1921, Mr. Andrew W. Mellon has not participated in or been connected with the management or the carrying on of its business nor with the determination of its policies.

The original agreement mentioned in the testimony and referred to herein is submitted herewith.

MAY 18, 1929.

Hon. FREDERICK STEIWER,

United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR STEIWER: Among the various minority reports from the Committee on the Judiciary pursuant to Senate Resolution No. 2 I notice a reference to testimony in a suit brought in the United States Court of Claims by the administratrix of the estate of one John H. Murphy against the United States, in which Mr. Peter F. Tague is reported to have said that former Secretary of War, Mr. Weeks, now deceased, had told him that I had been given, on behalf of the "Standard Pressed Steel Car Co." an option for the sale of certain cars belonging to the United States Government.

When this testimony was called to my attention, it was the first intimation I ever had regarding the sale by the War Department of such cars or an option given by it to sell the same. I think you should also be advised that I was not given an option for the sale of cars by former Secretary Weeks, nor by any other Government department, either on my own behalf or on behalf of the Standard Steel Car Co. or any other concern or individual. Moreover, I have never discussed the matter of an option for the sale of such cars either with former Secretary Weeks or with the Standard Steel Car Co. or with anyone connected with that company, nor do I have any recollection of former Secretary Weeks ever speaking to me regarding the matter. Furthermore, I have inquired of those in charge of the affairs of the Standard Steel Car Co. and am informed that that company never received an option for the sale of such cars nor did it ever buy or dispose of the same. The officers of the company have advised me that they will be glad to submit affidavits to this effect. Incidentally, while I am a stockholder in the Standard Steel Car Co., I do not know of any company called the "Standard Pressed Steel Car Co." There is a company known as the "Pressed Steel Car Co.," in which I have never been a stockholder, but I have furnished you this information on the assumption that the Standard Steel Car Co. was referred to. A question arises in my mind as to whether or not such an informal offer of this kind would have been made by the Secretary of War to a mere stockholder of a company, and whether such an option would have been legal if made.

It is unnecessary for me to repeat here, in view of my letter of April 18 to Senator REED, that I have not concerned myself in the affairs of the companies in which I own stock nor have I dictated their affairs in any way since holding the office of Secretary of the Treasury. But in view of the fact that Senator WALSH has printed as part of his report excerpts from the testimony above referred to, and has made particular reference to certain testimony in the suit of George D. Haskell against the Aluminum Co. of America (p. 1033, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 9, 1929), I feel that you should be in possession of the facts as stated in this letter and also in my two letters of May 1, 1929, to Senator REED. These letters, I understand, were submitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, but appear not to have been included in Senator WALSH'S report.

In those letters I stated that I was not a party to the negotiations being carried on by Mr. Davis, the president of the Aluminum Co., with Mr. James B. Duke, to which reference was made by Senator WALSH in his report. I stated specifically that I did not take part in those negotiations and that, while Mr. Davis and Mr. Duke visited me in Washington in 1925, their visit was of no importance and was not essential in any way to the business transactions of the Aluminum Co. Furthermore, that in joining the Aluminum Co.'s party for their trip to Canada, I did so while on vacation at Southampton merely as a matter of pleasure and recreation and that I had no business responsibility of any kind while on the trip.

Neither on that occasion nor at any other time have I participated in the management, the carrying on of the business, or the determination of the policies of the Aluminum Co. of America since I assumed the office of Secretary of the Treasury on March 4, 1921. Mr. Davis, the former president of the Aluminum Co. of America and now chairman of the board of directors, submitted an affidavit to that effect, which I understand was placed before the Committee on the Judiciary but also appears to have been omitted in Senator WALSH'S report.

Sincerely yours,

A. W. MELLON.

Murphy, deceased, in the suit brought in the Court of Claims of the United States by the administratrix of the estate of John H. Murphy, nor do the records of this corporation indicate that it received any such option either directly or through the medium of Mr. Mellon. Furthermore, I was connected with the Standard Steel Car Co. during the year 1921, and am thoroughly acquainted with the transactions had by that company during said year, and I further depose and say of my own knowledge, as well as from the records of the corporation, that the corporation did not have an option for the sale of said cars, nor were there any negotiations between the company or its representatives and the War Department, or Secretary Weeks, looking toward the company obtaining an option on said cars, nor did it purchase or dispose of any of the cars referred to in said testimony.

2. That from on or about September, 1921, to February 15, 1929, I was an attorney in the office of the Attorney General of the United States and was in direct charge of the defense on behalf of the United States of the case of M. Grace Murphy, administratrix of the estate of John H. Murphy, deceased, against the United States, No. D–921, in the Court of Claims of the United States.

3. That my attention has been called to the report of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate of the United States pursuant to Senate Resolution No. 2 as contained in report No. 7 of the United States Senate and in particular to pages 38 and 39 thereof wherein certain questions and answers are set out which have been taken from pages 28 and 29 and pages 66 and 69, respectively, from the record in the case of M. Grace Murphy, administratrix, of the estate of John H. Murphy, deceased, v. United States, No. D–921, in the Court of Claims of the United States. The questions and answers referred to relate to the testimony of Peter F. Tague and John H. Murphy (now deceased). This testimony purports to show that in September, 1921, the said Tague and Murphy interviewed Secretary of War John W. Weeks at his office in Washington with respect to certain surplus Army railroad rolling stock and equipment.

4. That in this testimony the said Murphy and Tague testified that Secretary Weeks said that he (Secretary Weeks) had given an option "to Secretary Mellon, for the Standard Pressed Steel Car Co.," for the sale of this rolling stock to France.

5. That on March 5, 1925, as Special Assistant to the Attorney General and as attorney in charge of the case above referred to, I interviewed Secretary Weeks in his office in Washington with a view to calling him as a witness for the United States in the said case. In that interview I called the attention of Mr. Weeks to the testimony of the said Tague and Murphy, as herein referred to, and asked him if he had given any option to Secretary Mellon for the Standard Pressed Steel Car Co., or if he had given any option to Secretary Mellon, or any other person or corporation, with respect to this rolling stock. He told me he had not given any option of any character to Secretary Mellon or to any other person or corporation. I further interviewed Mr. Weeks with respect to numerous other matters not directly concerned with the question of this alleged option. He agreed to appear and testify as to the statements he had made to me, including his statement that he did not give any option to Secretary Mellon or to any other person or corporation, and accordingly his deposition was arranged to be taken on April 20, 1926, and plaintiff's counsel was so notified. On or about April 17, 1926, the Attorney General's office was notified that upon advice of his physician Secretary Weeks would be unable to give his deposition on April 20, 1926. Accordingly, the date was left open until such time as Mr. Weeks was physically able to appear and testify. Unfortunately, however, Mr. Weeks became seriously ill and died before he could be examined as a witness.

6. That had Secretary Weeks been called as a witness I would have questioned him with respect to this alleged option. I might state in passing that the existence of the alleged option was immaterial to any issue involved on the merits of the suit, but the United States had intended to examine Mr. Weeks with respect to same with a view to attacking the credibility of the plaintiff.

FARM RELIEF—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, on yesterday, after the vote of the Senate rejecting the farm bill, the President of the United States gave out a statement in reference to that vote from which I quote:

> The vote in the Senate to-day at best adds further delay to farm relief and may gravely jeopardize the enactment of legislation.

I was one of those who asked for an extra session of Congress to consider the farm problem. I did so because I did not consider that the Coolidge-Jardine farm bill was adequate, and confidently expected a better bill from the new President. He added strength to that confidence himself by his silence; and the farm bill was therefore not considered in the short session of Congress. If the President elect had frankly made known the fact that he would not support a better bill than the Jardine bill, it might just as well have been passed in the short session and the extra session of Congress avoided altogether. If there is delay in the enactment of farm legislation under these conditions, the blame rests upon the President himself and not upon the Senate, which is doing its duty in its efforts to solve this greatest problem.

Again, the President said:

> In rejecting the report of the Senate and House conferees, which report was agreed to by members of both parties, the Senate has in effect rejected a bill which provides for the creation of the most important agency ever set up in the Government to assist an industry—the proposed Federal farm board, endowed with extraordinary authority to reorganize the marketing system in the interest of the farmer; to stabilize his industry and to carry out these arrangements in conjunction with farm cooperatives, with a capital of $500,000,000 as an earnest of the seriousness of the work.

Again, Mr. President, the President of the United States is in very great error when he pronounces this bill, recommended by the conference report, to be "the most important agency ever set up in the Government to assist an industry." I want to call the attention of the Senate and the country to the fact that this Government set up a Food Administration and a Wheat Corporation with power to fix prices, with power to condemn facilities, with power to buy and sell farm products, and with power to maintain the farmers' cost of production plus a reasonable profit even under war-time conditions. The Wheat Corporation was also given a billion dollars on the 4th of March, 1919, after the war was over. Contrast this with the little $500,000,000 proposed in this bill for all farm surplus, and with the fact that the only financial power of the board is to lend to farm cooperatives upon good security, and it becomes apparent at once that the President's statement is the gravest possible error.

Again, the President said:

> It is a proposal for steady upbuilding of agriculture onto firm foundations of equality with other industry and would remove the agricultural problem from politics and place it in the realm of business.
>
> The conferees' bill carried out the plan advanced in the campaign in every particular. Every other plan of agricultural relief was rejected in that campaign and this plan was one of the most important issues in the principal agricultural States and was given as a mandate by an impressive majority in these States. Subsidies were condemned in the course of the campaign and the so-called debenture plan—that is, the giving of subsidies on exports—was not raised by either party nor by its proponents.

Again, the President is entirely in error when he says:

> And the so-called debenture plan—that is, the giving of subsidies on exports—was not raised by either party nor by its proponents.

The Democratic platform distinctly said:

> The solution of this problem would avoid Government subsidy, to which the Democratic Party has always been opposed.

This is the platform that was rejected by the people in the election. I pointed out this provision of the Democratic platform throughout the campaign and gave it as one of the vital reasons why I opposed the Democratic Party and its candidates. I constantly called attention to the fact that I myself had proposed a bill which paid the losses of an export corporation for farm surplus out of the Treasury of the United States to the amount of $600,000,000. This amount I estimated to be the total of the subsidy the Government had paid the railroads after they were turned back to pay their war profits, added to the profits of the wheat corporation, which Mr. Hoover had turned into the Treasury of the United States. The Senator from Idaho had voted for my bill as a substitute for the McNary-Haugen bill. I constantly pointed to this fact and the further fact that Senator BORAH sat upon the resolutions committee and saw to it that no provision went into the Republican platform in conflict with the provisions of the bill for which he had voted. Therefore the question of subsidy was raised, and it was settled by the people in exactly the opposite manner from that stated by the President.

Again, the President said:

> No serious attempt has been made to meet the many practical objections I and leaders in Congress have advanced against this proposal.

It was not accepted by the House of Representatives and has been overwhelmingly condemned by the press and is opposed by many leading farm organizations. For no matter what the theory of the export subsidy may be, in the practical world we live in it will not bring equality but will bring further disparity to agriculture. It will bring immediate profits to some speculators and disaster to the farmer.

I earnestly hope that the Congress will enact the conferees' report and allow us to enter upon the building of a sound agricultural system rather than to further deprive the farmer of the relief which he sorely needs.

The President says:

No serious attempt has been made to meet the many practical objections I and leaders in Congress have advanced against this proposal.

. I now desire to make such serious attempt. I propose that the debenture be issued to the Federal farm board instead of the speculators, whom the President and I both heartily condemn. I propose that the farm board be given authority to use these debentures exactly as the President of the United States himself had authority to use the funds of the Government in the Food Administration and the wheat corporation, including the authority to pay losses on all farm surpluses bought at a price not exceeding the average preceding 5-year cost of production plus a 5 per cent return upon capital investment. If there had been loss in the wheat corporation, the Treasury would have paid it. Instead the Treasury got profits, and the proper management of this Federal farm board may result in the same way and in a little while the debentures discontinued and the whole thing turned over to the farmers under cooperative control.

I now desire to say to the progressive Members of the Senate on both sides of the aisle that if this proposition is rejected the time has come to organize for a fight to the finish. If the debenture in the form I have here suggested, or in its present form, can not be put into the farm bill, I think the bill should be permitted to pass without it. If there were nothing to hope from this bill by its present provisions, I would vote against it. But I believe we shall be able to put the debenture into the tariff bill in the form I have here suggested. In order to make sure that this be possible, we should at once organize to put up a progressive candidate in every congressional district and for Senator in every State who will fight for this program; and if the bill should be vetoed, we should follow this with a progressive candidate for President.

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have had a short speech in storage for three or four days, but I did not want to break into the discussion pending before the Senate, and so have refrained from imposing on the Senate. Conditions have changed somewhat since I prepared this speech, but they are not very different, and so I am going to use the time of the Senate for perhaps 15 minutes with regard to a matter that I think of some importance.

In the interest of brevity, I have reduced to writing what I have to say. I desire to say that generally I welcome interruptions, but I ask that I be not interrupted while I deliver this speech.

Mr. President, there have been daily rumors that Congress is going to recess until September and that an arrangement may be made to take a vote on the tariff bill sometime in November. It has been current among Senators that something of this kind is being arranged by the leaders of the Senate on both sides of the Chamber. The impression has been given in the press from time to time that such an arrangement is agreeable to the President, and even that he has expressly assented to it.

In the Post of Monday, June 10, the United Press says:

Republican leaders in both the House and Senate, supported by President Hoover and helped by Washington's torrid summer weather, are trying to arrange a recess from the end of next week to the 1st of September, but their chances for success seem smaller every day.

There seems to have been a studious effort to connect the President with the various recess plans. I do not pretend to quote the President or to speak for him; but I assert that such an arrangement has not been assented to by him, is not agreeable to him, and, on the contrary, is against his desires, and, if carried out, will be done solely on the responsibility of Congress. If the President has assented to any recess until September, in my judgment such assent has been given on conditions that have not been made known by those seeking to arrange for this recess. I assert that, in my judgment, the President has not assented to any recess and would not assent to any recess that would put off a vote on the tariff bill in the Senate beyond September. I doubt very much if that would be at all agreeable to him, because he knows, as we know, that such a vote should be had not later than August.

I see by the press that the President is going to remain in Washington during the summer because of press of work. That is an example the Senate should follow. It should stay here until its work is done.

One of the assurances given in the late campaign by the Republicans was that, if successful, an extra session would be called to deal with the urgent problem of farm relief; and one of the essential elements of that problem was alleged to be tariff action along certain lines. Influential members of this body took this attitude, and the people were assured, that earnest effort would be made and prompt action be taken along these lines. It was never suggested, or even hinted, that such action would be subordinated to our individual convenience and pleasure.

The President called Congress in special session at as early a date as practicable to consider farm relief, and, as a fundamental part of it, a limited revision of the tariff. His duty was done. He could do no more. The responsibility for further action rested solely upon Congress. I want to impress this upon the people of the country. If the people and the country suffer from the delay in the passage of the legislation upon which Congress was called to act, Congress should be held accountable, and not the President. He has thus far justified the confidence the people have placed in him.

The House of Representatives has acted promptly. The work it was called to do has been done. It must wait upon us. It is entitled to, and should be permitted to take, a couple of months' recess.

Why should we recess now for two or three months? What excuse have we to do it? It has not been done during the consideration of tariff bills in the last 40 years, and I doubt if it has ever been done. There have been four or five tariff acts passed during this period. The consideration of each one of them has extended into, if not through, the summer months.

The McKinley Tariff Act passed the House May 21, 1890, and was referred to the Finance Committee of the Senate May 23. Hearings were finished, the bill was considered in the committee and reported to the Senate June 18, or less than a month after it was referred, and passed the Senate September 20, 1890. No long summer recess was had by the statesmen of that day.

The Dingley Tariff Act was referred to the Finance Committee April 1, 1897. Hearings were had and it was reported to the Senate May 4, 1897, and it passed the Senate July 7. It was agreed to in conference and approved by the President July 24.

The Payne-Aldrich Act was referred to the Finance Committee April 19, 1909, and was reported back to the Senate the same day. Evidently the committee had been holding hearings and giving consideration to the bill while it was being acted upon in the House. It passed the Senate July 8 and was approved by the President August 5.

The Underwood-Simmons Tariff Act was referred to the Finance Committee May 16, 1913, reported back to the Senate July 11, and passed the Senate September 9. It was approved by the President October 3. No recesses were had over the summer months. The Democrats stuck to the work they had to do, and did it.

The Fordney-McCumber Act was referred to the Finance Committee July 22, 1921. It was reported to the Senate April 11, 1922, passed the Senate August 19, and was approved by the President September 21. The Congress in 1921, when this act was referred to the Finance Committee, continued in session until November 23—no recess over the summer months and no recess during the summer of 1922.

The Canadian reciprocity bill was referred to the Finance Committee April 24, 1911, and continued under consideration until July 22, with no recess.

Is it possible that the men who handled those measures were more hardy than the men who will handle the tariff bill now? We may confess by our action that we are more feeble, more enervated, more susceptible to the rigors of summer than they, but I do not think we are. Will we confess to the country by our action that we are less mindful of the public interests and more solicitous for our personal comfort than were those who framed other tariff bills? That could well be concluded from what is proposed. Surely we do not want to give that impression to the public.

It is urged that we should have a rest, so that we can come back in the fall refreshed for the hard task to be done. That sounds good, but it is ridiculous in view of the facts. The country knows the facts. We may, ostrichlike, seek to conceal them, but we can not do it. What are the facts? Since the 29th of May, 1928, Congress has been in session just five months, and that five months has been divided into two or three periods, with vacations of two weeks at Christmas and almost a month and a half from March 4 last until April 15. In other words, during the last 12 months we have been in session 5 months, with 2 restful intermissions, and yet it is urged that we must have a long rest now.

It is urged, too, that the committee needs time to get the tariff bill ready. That is true, but it does not need three months. I am not going to criticize the committee. Its members are all most industrious, faithful, and hard working, but I am going to give the country the facts which I think make the delay proposed inexcusable.

The final amendments to the tariff bill were reported to the House about May 23. Then we knew what the tariff bill would contain. Hearings could, and should, have been begun within a very few days thereafter. They could have been almost, if not entirely, concluded by the middle of this month, instead of just begun. Our committee knew this was to be its work, and should have begun it without delay. Knowing how tremendous a worker the chairman of that committee is, and that he is as able a chairman as that committee has ever had, and the other members are as able as any members it has ever had, I can not understand the delay permitted on this vital act.

It is urged by some members of the Finance Committee that it should not meet while the Senate is in session. With all due deference, I say that the Senate sessions do not depend any more on that committee than upon any other committee of the Senate. There is not an important committee of this body that does not meet at times when the Senate is in session. The country needs early and prompt action by the Finance Committee on this tariff act more than the Senate needs the presence of its members during all its sessions.

The welfare of the country demands early and prompt action. Business is halting, hesitating, waiting, and hoping for action, as it always does when a tariff bill is pending. The longer we delay the greater the danger of industrial disaster. The Republican Party will be held responsible for results. What excuse can we give to business and industry for the delay contemplated?

We declare and consider tariff legislation a prime element of farm relief. Delay its enactment until the last of November, and probably later, and it will bring the farmer little benefit from this year's crop.

This tariff bill should not take the time tariff bills usually take, especially before the committee. It deals with a Republican act, now on the statute books, that has served the country well, and under which there is now general, unsurpassed business activity and prosperity. The bill that has come to us has been prepared by a Republican committee after long and comprehensive hearings and study, and has been passed by a Republican House. A Republican Senate can very safely, and in my judgment wisely, refrain from making very many changes in it. If there is any just cause of complaint to be found with it, it is that it has gone too far and increased duties on articles that need no increases and has dealt with industries that are generally prosperous.

From a political standpoint, our Democratic friends might want this bill enacted into law just as close to the next election as possible. They might be pleased to have the people pass upon it before it has time to demonstrate its efficiency. I could not blame them for this, but I am not in favor of our cooperating with them in delaying it. Let us get this bill before the Senate as soon as possible, and if there is any unnecessary delay, the people will know where to put the blame.

I can not refrain from commending the attitude of our Democratic friends toward the business of the Senate; instead of being partisan and obstructive, it is patriotic and helpful. They had a conference yesterday morning. They are going to cause no unnecessary delay. They want to see the business of the session done promptly. Their chairman, according to the press, issued the following statement:

> The conference discussed at length the business of the Senate, including farm relief, national origins, and the tariff. The unanimous opinion of those present appears to be that a vote should be taken in the early future on the motion to agree to the conference report on the farm bill and the question relating to national origins.
> We will consent to any arrangement the majority desires pending the hearings on the tariff bill, but no agreement will be entered into now to fix a date for a vote on the tariff bill.
>
> Our desire is to proceed in the Senate in such matter as will dispose of all questions brought forward during the extra session in an orderly way, and we believe this disposition should be made during the present session. There is no purpose to delay action on any of the subjects referred to, but we feel that they should be proceeded with as promptly as practicable.
> So far as the chairman of the conference now knows a vote may be reached to-morrow on the farm bill conference report and before the end of the week on the national-origins issue.

This attitude of the minority should wipe out any thought of delay on the part of the majority, and spur us to earnest, energetic, and prompt consideration of the problems before us.

We have been proud of our capacity to run governmental affairs. We have boasted of the record we have made. Are we going to show that we have lost our ability to do these things?

Mr. President, I hope the Senate will do what every Senate in the past has always done on tariff legislation. Let us stick to our duty until it is done. Then we can go to our people without apologizing, and we can begin the next regular session rested and prepared to meet energetically the problems that will confront us then.

Mr. BRATTON obtained the floor.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BRATTON. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. No; I do not ask the Senator to yield. I want to make some remarks on the subject just discussed by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BRATTON. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. WATSON. I thank the Senator. With the general proposition announced by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] I am in full accord, but I do not agree with him as to some of the details of the statement.

I have perhaps indulged in as much conversation as anybody about a recess, and my object was not to delay but to expedite the passage of legislation. If the Senate shall be in session while the Finance Committee is considering the tariff bill, it will take fully twice as long for the Finance Committee to do its work under those conditions. I do not think anyone can dissent from that statement.

If the Finance Committee have hearings from 9.30 to 12 each day only, and then the members be compelled to come into the Senate to listen to whatever may be going on here instead of going on with the hearings through the afternoon, we not only shall not be able to consider the questions brought before us connectedly and systematically, but we will have to consider them in a way that will not permit us to formulate the bill as we otherwise could in one-half the time, in my judgment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. To what extent is the Finance Committee going to revise the tariff?

Mr. WATSON. I can not answer that question.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator understand that it is going to be a general revision?

Mr. WATSON. I understand that it is going to be fully as general as the one provided by the bill as it passed the House. As to whether or not other propositions will be taken up, I do not know, and neither does anyone else.

Mr. BORAH. This session was called for the purpose of dealing with the farm problem. Would it not be practicable to limit the revision of the tariff to duties on farm products?

Mr. WATSON. I do not think so.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is my understanding that the bill which passed the House contains 4,000 items, and that is about the number contained in general tariff bills, is it not?

Mr. WATSON. There are about 4,400 items in a general tariff bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Are there forty-four hundred items in this bill?

Mr. WATSON. No; in a general tariff bill. There are something like 4,000, perhaps, in this bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. About 4,000?

Mr. WATSON. That is my understanding.

Mr. McKELLAR. So it is a general tariff bill, and not a limited tariff bill at all?

Mr. WATSON. That is my view of it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. KING. As far as the Senator from Indiana has proceeded, I agree with him entirely.

May I say to my friend the Senator from Idaho that I think the House failed to observe the wishes of the President with respect to the ground which should be covered in the tariff bill. The President, as I understood, desired a farm relief bill, and a limited consideration of the tariff, dealing only with agricultural products. The House had hearings for weeks and weeks. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], who has just spoken, does not seem to take into consideration, in the statement he has made, the long, long weeks and months given by the House to the tariff bill which he expects us to consider in a few days. In the hearings 1,100 witnesses testified, thousands of pages of testimony were taken, thousands of exhibits were filed, hundreds of briefs were presented.

In contravention of the recommendation of the President, the House Committee on Ways and Means went into a general tariff revision, and in my opinion, judging from the demands which have been made upon me as a member of the Finance Committee—and I am sure similar demands have been made on other Senators—there is a purpose on the part of the manufacturing interests of the United States, those who are profiting by extortionate tariffs, to have this tariff bill broader than any which has ever been enacted. If something is not done, we will be in the committee rooms for days and weeks listening to the multiplied witnesses who come, and we will present a bill to the Senate which will be worse than any former tariff bill, and can be properly denominated the "tariff of abominations."

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I have heard my friend utter these dismal prophecies so often that I pass them by, knowing the general tenor of his remarks on the subject of the tariff. That is not what I want to talk about, however. I have great respect for the ability of my friend the Senator from Utah.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Before the Senator goes into what he intends to talk about, following up the suggestion made by the Senator from Utah that this tariff bill does not meet the wishes of the President, may I ask the Senator from Indiana, who is the leader on the other side, if there has been communicated to him any wish of the President respecting the restriction of the tariff legislation?

Mr. WATSON. There has not been.

Mr. HARRISON. Then, so far as the Senator knows, the tariff bill as passed by the House meets the approval of the President?

Mr. WATSON. I will not say that, because I have had no conversation about it with the President at any time. We have been engaged in the consideration of the farm bill.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATSON. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARRIS. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has recommended Muscle Shoals legislation. I ask the Senator if something should not be done about considering that legislation during the extra session?

Mr. WATSON. I do not know why the Senator should ask me about that measure. I am not in control of the business of the Senate. My understanding is that there is nothing to be done with it at this special session.

Mr. HARRIS. The Muscle Shoals development means more to the farmers of the South than all the other legislation which has been suggested or has been before the Senate.

Mr. WATSON. Now, I would like to proceed with my statement about the recess.

Let me first say that I have had no personal policy to enforce. The question of a recess means nothing to me of a personal nature. I am a member of the Finance Committee, and I am compelled to stay here, anyhow. The only motive that actuated me was to try to help pass the legislation in due season. In trying to make an arrangement for a recess I was not unmindful of the length of time required to pass tariff bills as shown by our experience in the past. The Fordney-McCumber bill was before the Senate of the United States for five straight months. I could very easily conceive that the present tariff bill might be kept here five straight months. It is the easiest thing in the world to offer amendments to a tariff bill, and with 4,000 items in the measure and with many men of many minds from all parts of the country to deal with it, it is the most natural thing in the world that amendments should be offered and debated.

What I started out to do was to fix a time beyond which we should not go in coming to a vote in order that we might pass the legislation at the present session of Congress. To my good friend from Washington [Mr. JONES], for whom I have such great affection, and with whom I have served so many years in both House and Senate, I will say that if now we could make an arrangement and had the power to do it to finally vote on the tariff bill on the last day of November, I should be very happy to make the arrangement, because then I would know that the tariff bill would be disposed of at this session of Congress, and not run over into the next session.

I want to give due credit to my distinguished friend from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and to the other members of the Democratic Party in the Senate. They met the other day, and we were told afterwards that they would not agree upon a definite time to vote, nor would they agree that we should vote not later than a certain day, fearing that all amendments might not be properly discussed. But I was further told—and if I am in error, then the Senator from Arkansas will correct me—that it was the unanimous expression of opinion of that gathering on that occasion that the bill should be acted on at this session and that they would resort to nothing extraordinary in order to prevent it being done.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is entirely true that there is no disposition on this side of the Chamber to delay by any unusual method the consideration and disposition of any bill brought forward during the extraordinary session pursuant to the President's program. The Democratic Senators who participated in the caucus on the subject were unanimously of the opinion that it would not be possible to fix a definite time for the vote on the bill or a date not later than which the vote should be taken.

The reasons suggest themselves. Always, when the Senate enters into an agreement in advance of the consideration of a measure to take a vote at a particular time, interest in the consideration of the measure is relaxed, and nothing substantial is done concerning it until the time for the vote is approaching. The mere fact that an agreement fixing a time to vote is entered into operates as a suspension of debate with reference to the subject matter of the agreement.

Our position is this: The President has announced a desire that tariff legislation shall be considered during the extraordinary session and acted upon, particularly with reference to the subject of farm relief. We do not desire in any way to obstruct that program. We expect, however, when the bill is brought in, that it will reflect a situation which will make necessary the consideration not only of committee amendments but of amendments which may be offered on the floor, and we do not desire to effect any arrangement that will prevent full and fair discussion and action upon those amendments.

I feel, and I think it is the sentiment of all of the other Senators on this side of the Chamber, that in fairness reasonably prompt action should be taken touching all the measures which are brought forward as a result of the President's program. We are not willing, however, merely in order to escape the disagreeable effect of carrying on work here in the Capital during the heated season, to jeopardize the principle for which we think we stand. We are willing to enter into any arrangement that safeguards the rights to which I have referred, but we are asking no arrangement. We shall consent to the plan of the Senator from Indiana with the limitations which I have expressed.

Mr. WATSON. I thank the Senator. In that regard he and his associates are clearly acting within their rights. That is the reason why it takes longer to pass a tariff bill than any other measure. It represents all the industries of the country. It touches every congressional district in America. In fact, it really touches the pocket of every man in the country. The producer and the consumer, the middleman, the manufacturer, and the farmer—all those are interested, and representatives of all must, of course, be heard in the consideration of a tariff bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. My understanding of the President's plan was that he proposed to limit tariff legislation largely to those provisions which have direct reference to the subject of farm relief. Is it the Senator's expectation or understanding that the body at the other end of the Capitol and this body will conform to that limitation, or is it to be expected that the whole subject matter of the tariff will be gone into and the schedules generally revised?

Mr. WATSON. I can answer that question in my own way.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I would not ask the Senator to answer it in any other way.

Mr. WATSON. I mean by that, speaking for myself and not representing the committee or anybody else. I am well aware of the fact that when the President called the special session of Congress, so far as the subject of the tariff was concerned, it was thought that changes, in so far as they related to the agricultural schedule and others where there was a dire necessity or an evident necessity, might be touched upon and regulated. When the House came to consider the matter they chose to interpret that to suit themselves, and, as the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has so well remarked, they examined—how many witnesses did the Senator say?

Mr. KING. Over 1,100 witnesses.

Mr. WATSON. They examined over 1,100 witnesses. They took thousands upon thousands of pages of testimony. They did not stop with agriculture. They could not stop with agriculture and do justice to certain industries in the United States which felt that they were entitled to tariff relief.

That came about because of the fact that when the act of 1922 was passed the whole world was in a state of flux just after the war. Nobody knew what the production costs were in other countries. We could not tell precisely what our competition was, and we had to face it at that time and base the rates on the difference in the costs of production here and abroad, and, of course, in multiplied thousands of cases we had to guess, and, of course, in multiplied thousands of cases mistakes were made.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Remembering that the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], chairman of the Finance Committee, chairman then and chairman now, guessed at that time that the rates in the bill would prove too high——

Mr. WATSON. Mr. McCumber was chairman of the committee then.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is correct, but the Senator from Utah——

Mr. HARRISON. He at least handled the sugar schedule.

Mr. WATSON. He was the ranking Republican member of the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes. The Senator from Utah made the statement in the councils of the committee, and I thank the Senator for the correction. He guessed at that time that the rates in the Fordney-McCumber bill would prove too high and in order to correct such errors as might appear in that way he strongly insisted upon the insertion of the flexible provision in the tariff act of 1922. His guess then was that it would be necessary to have such a provision in order that the President in the exercise of the very extraordinary power conferred upon him by Congress, the power to fix rates of taxation or tariff rates, might reduce such rates as proved too high and, of course, raise such rates as proved too low.

Now it appears that the insistence of many is to the effect that the rates in the Fordney-McCumber bill are too low and that if there is to be a modification of those rates which have particular effect on farm conditions there must be a revision of many other rates affording protection to the manufacturers, and that principle in large measure was recognized in the bill as it passed the body at the other end of the Capitol.

I wonder if the Senator from Indiana is in a position to announce whether it is the opinion of the majority that the large increases embraced in the House bill should be omitted and the rates substantially reduced as affecting the tariff generally, or whether the process which seems to be gathering volume since the House heard 1,100 witnesses on the subject shall continue and the Finance Committee shall be expected to lend itself to the process of offsetting whatever benefits may be expected from such a farm relief bill as the Congress is likely to pass by the imposition of additional tax burdens on the consumers and farmers of the Nation through heavily increased tariff rates.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, my good friend has asked such an involved question that it will take some time to answer it all.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I can ask one in more simple form if the Senator prefers.

Mr. WATSON. As to the first part of the program, with reference to the tariff being a tax and being an excessive burden, I do not want to answer that, because it would take all afternoon.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Will the Senator let me ask the question in simpler form so that even he can understand it? [Laughter.]

Mr. WATSON. I shall be glad to answer the question if the Senator will ask it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does the Senator anticipate that the efforts of the Finance Committee will be directed to correcting errors made in the body at the other end of the Capitol in unduly increasing the tariff generally, or does he expect that the Senate and the Finance Committee shall join in the policy of heaping heavier and heavier tariff duties on the consumers of the country?

Mr. WATSON. The Republican members of the Finance Committee have had no meeting for the purpose of formulating a policy, but I do not believe that the Finance Committee feels itself under any obligation to accept the House bill as it is. As to whether or not the rates are too high depends upon the testimony given over there and the testimony which we ourselves shall take.

But let me give an illustration——

Mr. GLASS and Mr. BORAH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WATSON. I ought to yield first to the Senator from Idaho, but if he will permit me I will yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. My personal affection for the Senator from Indiana is such that I want to draw his attention to an inadvertence of speech which he made awhile ago that furnished a more definite answer to the Senator from Arkansas than he has given since.

Mr. WATSON. I have not had a chance since then.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, the Senator said, as I understood him, that the tariff bill as sent over from the House touches the pocket of every man, woman, and child in the United States.

Mr. WATSON. It touches the interests of the whole country.

Mr. GLASS. It touches the pocket——

Mr. WATSON. Every tariff bill touches the pocket, but not in the sense in which the Senator speaks.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator did not mean to admit that.

Mr. WATSON. Yes; I do mean to admit that very thing; that there is not anything which so universally affects all the people as the passage of a tariff bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WATSON. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I should like to understand the program.

Mr. WATSON. I have not been able to announce it as yet, I will say to my friend.

Mr. BORAH. Then I will not interfere with the Senator until he gets through, only I wish to ask him to have this in mind so as to advise us before he shall conclude: Are the Republican members of the Finance Committee willing to undertake a limited revision of the tariff, embracing the schedules affecting farm commodities?

Mr. WATSON. I do not think so; and speaking only for myself, I am not.

Mr. BORAH. Then, Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Will the Senator from Idaho permit me to ask the Senator from Indiana a question?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Will the Senator from Indiana favor the Senate with further information as to the extent to which he believes Congress should go in revising the tariff? Of course, I know he can not go into that question in great detail.

Mr. WATSON. No; I can not do that, for that is in the future. It depends upon a careful examination of the rates imposed by the measure that came from the House. I have read the House bill, I will say to my friend, with some care; I have had comparisons made, and all that sort of thing; I have some knowledge of the tariff, as the Senator knows, having served on the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate and studied the question; and yet I am not able now to give the Senator an answer as to whether the rates are too high or too low in the multiplied hundreds of instances. I do not know as to that, and that is the very object of the investigation. The mere fact——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. WATSON. I hope the Senator will wait a moment. The mere fact that the House has embodied so many provisions in the tariff measure necessitates investigation by the Senate committee; there is no escape from that conclusion; else we would just swallow the bill as it comes to us without investigation. The Senator would not want that done. I do not know what the result of the committee's investigation will be, whether it will be to lower the rates or modify them or raise them; I do not know as to that, and no person ever will know until the investigation shall have been made and the committee shall have agreed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And some will not know then.

Mr. WATSON. I hope the Senator did not mean anything personal by that remark?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, no; I merely meant this, and perhaps I should elaborate the thought: A tariff bill which contemplates a general revision is necessarily so voluminous that it is difficult even for men studying it carefully for a prolonged period to comprehend the changes that it makes; and the country probably will not know when we pass the tariff bill what it embraces, and a good many Members of the Senate and of the body at the other end of the Capitol will still be in a similar condition, notwithstanding the debates which have taken place and will take place over various features of the bill. However, what I desire to ask the Senator from Indiana in this connection is whether he favors a general revision of the tariff or favors a policy of limited revision, such as that set forth in the President's message?

Mr. WATSON. I favor at least such a general revision of the tariff as is embodied and manifested in the House bill. I do not see how we can escape that conclusion.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I am surprised at the Senator from Indiana disagreeing with the President on the question of revising the tariff. It almost makes me conclude that he is on the "pseudo" list.

Mr. WATSON. Not at all.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Or is a "nonconformist."

Mr. WATSON. Not at all. The House saw fit to investigate the tariff; it saw fit to investigate it for months; it had the bill four and a half months, from the time the Ways and Means Committee started the hearings until the bill was finally passed. In that four and a half months——

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON. I am not going to yield any more, I will say to my friend from Tennessee; I wish to finish this statement.

Mr. McKELLAR. When the Senator concludes, I will ask him to yield.

Mr. WATSON. The thousands of items embodied in the tariff bill of necessity required investigation, and when the bill comes here before our committee, as it now is, of necessity it requires investigation there. That is the point to which I want to recur. Now, let me say to my friend from Washington [Mr. JONES] that this, for instance, is what happened before our committee this morning: A man appeared there to discuss the question of United States valuations. He had a written statement, and it appeared to me as if it ought to have been read in 30 minutes; yet he had no sooner started until members of the committee began to ask him questions. All the members of the committee began to ask questions of him, and particularly our Democratic friends.

I do not complain of that; they had a perfect right to do it; but, if my friend from Washington had been there, I should like to know how he would have shut those questions off or prevented their being asked. It simply can not be done. The members of the committee were there; they wanted to ask questions; they have their rights; they are United States Senators; and, led by my good friend from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], they asked many questions. I think they were clearly within their rights; but all down the list the questions went, and instead of the witness finishing his testimony in 30 minutes, I should say he was an hour and a half, and perhaps longer than that. That is what happens every time a man comes before the Senate Finance Committee. We can not say to a Senator, "You shall not ask that question," and head him off.

Mr. BORAH. No; but——

Mr. WATSON. I know what my friend from Idaho is going to say. He is going to say that we did not have to have the man come before the committee; but how are we going to avoid that?

Mr. BORAH. The committee could have a rule, or at least I suppose it could have such a rule, as would limit the subject matters as to which they were going to raise or lower the duties. The committee could announce that it would confine its work to agricultural commodities; that is what we are here for.

Mr. WATSON. Let me ask the Senator this question——

Mr. BORAH. Those subject matters ought to be such as relate to farm schedules or farm duties.

Mr. WATSON. Let me ask the Senator this question: The House has formulated and passed a bill and sent it over to us; does the Senator say we should pay no attention to that bill, but should start out de novo and make a new bill?

Mr. BORAH. I would pay no attention to that part of it which deals with other than farm schedules.

Mr. WATSON. Then the Senator believes that we can revise the tariff as to the agricultural schedules alone, without any reference to any other schedules in the entire bill?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I do so believe. The others have ample protection compared with agriculture.

Mr. WATSON. I do not.

Mr. BORAH. For instance, what has cement to do with the welfare of the farmer?

Mr. WATSON. What does any industry that employs labor have to do with the welfare of the farmer in the United States? What have shingles to do with his welfare? I will ask my friend from Washington [Mr. JONES] that question, and over there is my other friend from Washington [Mr. DILL].

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; if we are going to let in those commodities which are not directly concerned with agriculture, of course we can shut out none, because there is no commodity but whose representatives want to be heard when it comes to the question of raising duties.

Mr. WATSON. Yes; or lowering them.

Mr. JONES and Mr. BINGHAM addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WATSON. I will yield to any Senator.

Mr. BORAH. That includes me, I presume?

Mr. WATSON. The Senator from Idaho was on the floor asking me a question, and I yield to him further.

Mr. BORAH. It is perfectly apparent now that we are going to have a general revision of the tariff?

Mr. WATSON. I should think so.

Mr. BORAH. Then, we will not be through—the Senator, I think, will agree with me—upon the 1st day of December.

Mr. WATSON. That is precisely the position I have taken; and it is precisely what I have told the President.

Mr. BORAH. I think it would be better for the country and much better for the farmers, so far as the question of a general revision of the tariff is concerned, if we would adjourn the Congress finally.

Mr. KING. That is a wise statement, and I concur in it.

Mr. WATSON. Would the Senator agree to adjourn the Congress?

Mr. BORAH. If it is the determination of the Republican leaders to have a general revision of the tariff, I will vote to adjourn the Congress. I would feel it is the best thing for agriculture.

Mr. HAWES and Mr. JONES addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WATSON. I referred to the Senator from Washington. I yield first to him.

Mr. JONES. The President's message is not confined solely to the tariff as affecting agricultural products.

Mr. WATSON. It is not.

Mr. JONES. But relates also to those industries which are shown to be in dire straits.

Mr. WATSON. That is true.

Mr. JONES. Then, if we can not show that the shingle industry is in dire straits, shingles should be excluded from consideration, but we can so show.

Mr. HAWES and Mr. GLASS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WATSON. I yield first to the Senator from Missouri.
